WHAT WE THINK

Britain's fault

No-one should have been surprised or shocked by the attempted storming of the Channel Tunnel at Christmas by a mob of more than 500 illegal immigrants, largely Afghans, at Sangatte. The mob were taking advantage of a slack period during the seasonal break to walk the Tunnel to Britain. They were confronted and held off by French riot police while train services were disrupted for 10 hours. It has been confidently predicted that further attempts of the same kind will be made in the near future.

The search for scapegoats proceeded immediately. The deputy director of the Red Cross refugee centre at Sangatte, one Michel Meriaux, was blamed for not informing either the tunnel operators or the police, though he knew of the plan beforehand. Our own Government and media have continued to blame the French authorities for allowing the centre to remain in operation, saying that this merely encourages the would-be migrants to make a beeline for Sangatte with a view to getting thence to the UK.

Nationalist comment

In fact, whatever responsibility may lie with M. Meriaux or the French authorities for this fiasco, where Britain is concerned the chief culprits are our own Government. Of all the countries in Europe that have become targets for the so-called 'refugees', Britain has been made the most attractive and is the one which most of the refugees want to get to. Our immigration controls are a total farce. The would-be arrivals know very well that they will get good accommodation and ample food and living allowances here while their applications to settle are being processed. In the meantime, it is the easiest thing in the world for them to disappear into the interior of the country and not be discovered – even if the authorities subsequently turn the applications down. They also know that, whatever the currents of public opinion, New Labour itself in fact wants the country to be flooded by immigrants as part of its policy of 'diversity'.

One aspiring immigrant stopped at Sangatte, Karimi Khram, from Kabul, put it in a nutshell: "We will not stop coming. We will try every night. We have to make it into the UK."

As long as this country remains the chief target for the asylum-seekers, they are going to make for Sangatte, for there lies the best springboard for their attempts to get here. If the French authorities closed the refugee centre down, they would only go somewhere else. They are making their way here because it has got around the world that we are the biggest suckers of all the countries to which they would consider heading.

Britain needs to send out a signal to the whole world that no more of these immigrants will be allowed in – quite regardless of what plausible case they may have for asylum. If this involves tough measures at our ports of entry to repel the invaders, then so be it. They were never forced to come here in the first place, and if they don't like the way they're treated when they arrive, then – hard cheese! They only have themselves to blame. Such a policy would not be needed for long anyway, as the message would soon get through.

Not that there is the slightest chance of this Government, or a Tory Government, adopting such a policy. Only the British National Party would ever have the courage to do that!

Nonsense about the riots

Apparently, those who thought they witnessed hordes of troublemakers, overwhelmingly Asian, running amok in Lancashire and Yorkshire last Summer, attacking people, setting fire to cars and shops and smashing up neighbourhoods, were experiencing hallucinations. Though some Asians were involved, at least an equal number of Whites were!

This, at least, is what we are expected to think if we believe a report, commissioned by the Home Office, which came out last month. The report alleges widespread rioting by Whites as well as Asians. It puts a great deal of blame on the police. It claims that so-called 'right-wing extremists' played a major part in the trouble. It says that some politicians have been at fault for not doing enough to promote 'togetherness' between the indigenous and ethnic minority communities. It does criticise some Asians too, as if as an afterthought. Big deal!

Just about everyone and everything are to blame for what happened – except, of course, this and previous governments' policy of allowing vast numbers of unassimilable immigrants to flood into Britain over the past 50 years. To suggest that that has been a factor in bringing about the mayhem simply would not do! It all follows a familiar pattern: people of the leftist-liberal persuasion (which means just about everyone exercising power in modern Britain) create catastrophes and then take it out on everyone but themselves. And far from acknowledging that a policy has failed and setting about reversing it, they protest that it has not been carried out thoroughly enough, and they demand that it be enforced with all the greater commitment!

At the centre of this exercise in self-whitewashing is a plea in the report for greater integration. "It is essential," it says in one part, "to establish a great sense of citizenship based on a few common principles which are shared and observed by all sections of the community.” The solution? Well, more of the ethnics need to learn English so that they won't feel 'separate' from the natives. There must be a sense of common 'British' nationality uniting everyone. Immigrant communities, Asian ones in particular, must be less 'segregated'.

WRECKED!

This is a what remained of a car showroom in the Manningham district of Bradford last July after a mob of Asians had been on the rampage the night before. It'd be better if we got more of them to speak English, says a Home Office report – meaning, presumably, that the mobsters would have been able to identify the function of the premises by reading the signs!

This, of course, has again opened up the inane debate which is not really a debate at all: between 'multi-culturalism' and 'multi-racialism'. The 'multi-culturalists' are seen as those who want to maintain the distinct identities of the various ethnic communities, while the 'multi-racialists' are the ones who urge integration into a single 'British' community – a kind of national and cultural gleichschaltung, as the Germans would put it. Tories like Lord Tebbit have for years been urging the latter. Many elements among Labour, by contrast, have stood in favour of 'multi-culturalism'. It now seems that the Labour mainstream, headed by the Government itself, is inclining towards the Tory view.

The argument, of course, is a red herring: an artificially contrived diversion from the real issue, which is whether we should have a large population of non-European peoples in Britain or not – in other words, whether the ethnics should stay or whether they should go. This magazine has always maintained that there is no future for such people in this country – nor any future for the country with them – whether they are segregated or integrated, whether they maintain distinct communities, identities and cultures or whether they are merged into one single stew. The latter has always been the American dream and principle – the 'Melting Pot' – and it has failed abysmally. Britain should take note, and not be led along the same road.

Actually, there is another factor of which we should be aware which intrudes into the race issue. This is that those who call for greater integration of the different communities have an ulterior motive of their own which they prefer to conceal. In a thoroughly homogenised 'multi-racial' (but not 'multi-cultural') population, people will be exposed just to the one cultural influence: globalist, capitalist, materialist, consumerist, liberal, permissive and 'politically correct'. That is precisely what our masters seek for us. The existence of 'multi-culturalism', on the other hand, carries the danger that some will be exposed to other influences not approved within the prevailing orthodoxy – influences particularly present in Islam, with its traditionalist and authoritarian leanings. We draw attention to the radio talk by Dr. W.L. Pierce, the text of which is reproduced elsewhere in this issue, in which this matter is examined in greater detail.

The right road ahead for Britain lies neither in multi-culturalism nor multi-racialism, but in complete racial separation and the eventual resettlement overseas of the non-white communities. However, pending this becoming possible we believe that of the two concepts – multi-culturalism or multi-racialism – the former is the lesser evil. At least it underlines that the Asian and Afro-Caribbean populations in this country are different, are not British and can never become so. That, at least, is a start towards the solution of the problem.

Britain made to look ridiculous

Over the past month or two, thanks to Tony Blair, the once-proud reputation of the British armed forces has been reduced to one of ridicule. Tony wanted, oh so much, to get some military glory in Afghanistan – not for Britain, of course, but for himself. He knew that most of the work in hunting down bin Laden would fall to the Americans, but he desperately craved to be in on the action somewhere so that he could pose as an heroic military leader. He therefore sent our troops in on the tails of the US forces.

It then turned out that President Bush didn't really want us there, and so the troops were, for the moment, stood down. It was a classic case of the noble Duke of York marching his men to the top of the hill...

Undismayed, Tony informed the world that after the conflict British forces would be on hand to police the progress of the Afghans towards 'democracy' and all that.

And that's the way the state of play stands at the moment. The British military, dangerously undermanned and overstretched due to savage cuts by Tony's Government, will have a substantial presence in Afghanistan acting as political commissars and glorified social workers, all at great expense to the taxpayers at home, and in defence of no recognisable British interest whatsoever.

What a shambles! What a come-down! What a national disgrace!

George who?

In one newspaper, the Daily Mail, in December no less than thirteen pages were given up to the death of a musician. Who could this be? Was it some latter-day Beethoven? Or a Wagner? Or a Sir Edward Elgar? No, it was a fellow called George Harrison, who once was a member of a 'pop' group called the Beatles.

The rest of the media reacted likewise. It was as if some cultural icon of monumentally great proportions had left this world, leaving us all inconsolably impoverished by his departure.

This editor just about qualified to be a member of the younger generation when the Beatles first came to prominence in the 1960s and most of his contemporaries were raving about how wonderful they were. He recalls hearing them once and being asked by a friend what he thought of them. "When I want to hear soprano voices," he replied, "I go and listen to women singing." A little later, examination of a photo of the group revealed them to look like sopranos as well as sounding like them.

In fact, the influence of the Beatles on British life was pretty malignant. Everything about them encouraged the decadence that became a hallmark of their times and is still with us, particularly the liberal attitudes on drug-taking that the likes of the Beatles encouraged. Millions of young folk looked up to them, and saw them as models to emulate – to Britain's detriment.

That there should be such an almighty fuss when one of them pops his clogs is quite beyond our understanding.

Or again, in view of the times in which we live, perhaps not.

The BBC does its worst

IT IS, as they say, easy to criticise – and this axiom has additional force when a nationalist organisation like the British National Party has just been the target of another of the vicious media smears that have become habitual over the years. The question is raised again and again: should the party leadership have given its co-operation to the smear-mongers in the making of the programme? Should it not have boycotted the whole project? Should the head of the party have agreed to be interviewed? This editor has, on a number of occasions in the past, been faced with these decisions when leader of the BNP, and on almost all such occasions has judged that more harm would be done by a boycott than by co-operation – always with the proviso that there should be rules to the co-operation which the programme-makers are obliged to observe.

In the case of the BBC Panorama programme on the BNP, broadcast on the 25th November, a party general members' bulletin stated: "It was clear that the BBC... could make the programme even if we refused to help. That would have put us in the same bracket as criminals or secretive terrorist groups..."

RIGHT TO CO-OPERATE

We believe that this was correct and that the decision to co-operate in the making of the programme was the right one. Just those same considerations governed similar decisions made by the party's previous leadership. It is very easy for those on the sidelines to protest to the contrary; they do not have the responsibility for ensuring that the party has its say in the public arena – something it would not be able to do if it adopted the rule that TV and press reporters who were biased against us should never be spoken to or in any other way provided with 'copy'. The fact is that media people who are biased against us means every-one, and that if we refuse to have anything to do with them they will still go ahead and do their worst – but without our being able to get in our own viewpoint in any shape or form.

The nature of the Panorama programme was, of course, totally predictable. The party was accused of being 'racist', 'neo-nazi', 'violent', 'anti-semitic' and full of 'criminals' – par for the course, in other words. But there was a new dimension to this particular hatchet job which should give us food for careful thought. It came during a period when the BNP has been extremely eager to shake off the old image of 'extremism' customarily given it by journalists and broadcasters, and has taken certain policy initiatives designed to achieve this. One has been the formation of an 'Ethnic Liaison Committee', whose announced purpose is to show everyone, by getting together with sundry non-European ethnic groups, that the BNP is not the awful 'racist' party of popular mythology. Another such initiative, similar in kind, has been a series of friendly approaches to certain ethnic communities, including Sikhs and Hindus, but not Muslims, with the same purpose in mind.

Yet another, which has struck even more deeply at the party's fundamental principles and traditions, has been the dropping of the aim of an eventual all-white Britain and a declaration by party leader Nick Griffin that, in his view, a bit of [non-white] immigration is better than none at all (see his article in our November issue).

In the same article Mr. Griffin explained these policy changes as being to "restrict the opportunities we give them [the media] to categorise us as 'racist' or 'extremist'..."

BEEB NOT HEARING

Well, one can only say that this message apparently did not get through to the makers of the recent Panorama programme, who depicted the BNP as being just as much 'racist' and 'extremist' as the media have ever done. But they depicted us as something else too. They presented the party as a bunch of liars – claiming to have become much more moderate and respectable but in fact being nothing of the kind. Throughout the programme there was constant reiteration of this theme: the BNP, the presenter and her colleague kept on saying, are trying to deceive the British public with all this 'new' imagery and that the public should not be fooled. "Lies, exaggeration, evasion" were words used at one point. Elsewhere it was stated that: "The so-called 'new-style' BNP is just a front."

A lesson should be learned from this experience. Tampering with fundamental policies just to get better media treatment is a wholly futile exercise. It doesn't result in our being shown 'gentler' but it does get us labelled 'dishonest' – and that is one smear too many.

The things they're saying

When the history of our times comes to be written, the Millennium Dome will be seen as a metaphor for the Blair Government.

A grandiose promise unkept. A huge waste of public money. Hot air, cronies, lies, deals that unravelled ...

We haven't punished this Government for the Dome yet, but we will one day. The crass decisions it makes on a daily basis likewise go unpunished, but this won't continue for ever. We'll crack, and then nothing it ever does again will be forgiven. Finally, we'll see the message in the shambles of the Dome.

This is the most successful culture the world has ever seen – not just in its influence but in its provision for the common people. Poverty is almost non-existent, compared with the grinding horrors of the Third World.

All societies are dynamic and in a state of flux; but we should not allow cultures which are comprehensive failures – and from which people are desperate to escape – to be accepted as equal to our own.

JOHN RIPPENGAL
Letter in The Daily Telegraph (27.12.01)

The Government's penchant for neo-imperialist intervention is the more fraught with danger because the Reverend Blair is himself a fresh incarnation of the self-righteous Christian zeal that inspired some of the great Victorian proconsuls in their time. In his emotional sermons to the Labour Party conference and last month's Guildhall banquet, he proclaimed a mission to lead the world in rescuing the continent of Africa (and other backward regions of the world) from poverty, tyranny, chaos and violence. As General de Gaulle might have said, projet ambitieux. But, if it proves more than the usual Blairite tele-evangelism, the British armed forces can look forward to many future Sierra Leones or, worse still, large-scale African Bosnias and Kosovos.

CORRELLI BARNETT
The Spectator (8.12.01)

The so-called problem of race is really part of the problem of being human. 'Racism', a term which has been conveniently imbued with nazi evil, is no more than a natural, universal and probably ineradicable instinct for preferring the accustomed to the unfamiliar.

Can any amount of pseudo-moralistic, guilt-inducing bullying abolish that most harmless instinct? Can even the mighty apparatus of the race-relations industry 'solve' that bogus 'problem'? Can laws and brainwashing make everyone an indistinguishable subject of that planned New World Order in which all races, all nations, tribes, neighbours and families will have been abolished? What misery, death and destruction will accompany the effort to realise that unattainable end?

Out of the present uproar, if we keep our heads, one good thing may come. The all-party censorship that for 50 years has prevented any open and honest discussion of the consequences of mass immigration may loosen its grip at last.

PETER SIMPLE

Civil libertarians should be worried about what is taking place in The Hague, where Serb nationalists are being railroaded by a Swiss woman who thinks she's Torquemada, and looks like him to boot. Or in Zimbabwe, where a maddening spiral into chaos and violence is taking place in order for that murderous thug Mugabe to continue living it up. What about the civil rights of the white farmers who made the country what it was before Mugabe stole it all? Not to forget the plight of the Palestinians, who are being pounded as I write and paying the price for the actions of the madmen of Hamas and war criminals like Sharon. Occupation, after all, and the taking away of one's dignity, is an act of violence.

TAKI THEODORACOPOULOS ('TAKI')
The Spectator (15/22.12.01)

As things stand, our children and grandchildren seem destined to suffer the same frustrations as we do. Perhaps their traffic jams will be even worse, their train journeys even slower. Those who govern us seem determined to carry on the old tradition combining under-investment and ineptitude – an indictment of our political masters as well as our civil service. Meanwhile, our Prime Minister's mind is hovering somewhere over Afghanistan.

The only hope, if he ever comes down to earth, is that he may realise that the British people could finally rouse themselves from their torpor and their dull acceptance of the second-rate. Perhaps he will fear that we will not forgive New Labour after nine years, as we did after four, for presiding over a gently declining transport system. Perhaps sheer terror will galvanise Tony Blair into decisive action. But I wouldn't bet on it.

STEPHEN GLOVER
Daily Mail (27.11.01)

On Tuesday I wondered if the lives of British troops were being put on the line in Afghanistan for the sake of the Prime Minister's vanity.

Now we know the answer.

Yes.

The only question now is whether Blair flies out to join them before Christmas.

As I suspected, the PM is peeved that he hasn't got enough of the credit for the military success in Afghanistan.

That's why he's so keen to commit British servicemen and women to lead the peace-keeping force.

He has no mandate for that, either from Parliament or public opinion.

The deal most of us thought we were signing up for was military action against bin Laden and the Taliban.

We didn't agree to British forces being bogged down indefinitely once the war was over, playing PC Plod in downtown Kabul.

Anyone trying to prevent the warring factions tearing each other apart in Afghanistan is on a loser.

But nothing must be allowed to come between the Grinning Jackanapes and a photo opportunity.

The Spectator (15/22.12.01)

PARALYSIS!

A COMMON THEME with regard to present-day Britain is that almost nothing runs properly. We have a Third World health service and a Third World public transport system. Our education has for many years been a national scandal. Our manufacturing industry has virtually collapsed, with what little is left of it owned largely by foreigners. The handling of the recent foot-and-mouth crisis was a cock-up from start to finish and was allowed to cut huge holes in our fragile farming industry. Our towns and cities are untidy, dirty and, increasingly, ugly – with tenth-rate standards of local government. Our immigration ‘controls’ are a total shambles, with the world and his wife being able to cross our borders with impunity. Law and order have completely broken down, while our social fabric disintegrates. Our foreign policy is just a joke, corresponding in no way to vital national interests but just following the latest prime ministerial whim. Tony Blair makes speeches against terrorism around the world, while capitulating to terrorism at home. We cannot even get right such things as a modern national sports stadium or the Millennium Dome. In short, Britain has become a depressingly incompetent country in almost every sector of affairs.

In a two-page focus on transport problems published in the Sunday Times of November 25th it was stated that: “Trains, planes and cars are grinding to a halt as our national infrastructure crumbles. With improvements stuck in the bureaucratic slow lane, why can’t we plan for the future?”

It is not as if national life flowed blithely on, with most people ignorant and unconcerned about the diminished quality of services; all of these have been the subjects of quite animated public debates in the press and on television. The Sunday Times item was merely one of many that have focused on what is wrong. There have been some quite sound contributions by journalists to analyses of transport, NHS and education deficiencies, and indeed most others – with the notable exception of our problems of race, where a clear taboo exists against any serious examination of where we are going astray.

We might look briefly at three areas of particular prominence where millions of words have been printed and where in fact we do not lack an enlightened consensus as to what needs to be done:-

● EDUCATION: Few any longer believe in the permissive, child-centred learning methods that came into vogue in the 1960s, in which pupils were given an input into decisions concerning class curricula, school discipline went out of the window and vital subjects such as geography and history subjected to

Ignorance of what is wrong with Britain is not our problem, says JOHN TYNDALL. The problem is that we lack the institutions and the kinds of people to get things done.

political correctness where not abandoned completely. In recent years there has been a growing awareness of the need to revert to traditional teaching methods. It has been reported that some improvements in exam results are now visible, but in view of the fact that test papers have been made so much easier by comparison with what they used to be it is difficult to evaluate these claims. Even putting the best complexion on developments, our educational standards still place us very near the bottom, if not actually at the bottom, of the European league.

● THE HEALTH SERVICE: For years, including the many years of Tory government prior to 1997, this public sector has been a disgrace. It is now widely recognised that the service is grossly underfunded by comparison with those of our neighbours in Europe, but it is also recognised that money alone is not the problem. We have observed that in countries like France and Germany, where vastly higher standards prevail, these standards are achieved by a combination of private and public sector health care; yet the prevailing ideology still warps the attitude of government towards the former, and improvements still are not visible. We suffer the regular indignity of seeing needy patients go abroad for the treatment they cannot get at home, and now government has consented to pay for this, even when it is private. Whilst this decision had to be made, it is symptomatic of a total national impotence in health matters.

TRANSPORT: As many a press commentary testifies, Britain is simply not getting there. The land that gave the world railways now has a railway system that is a disgrace, with dirty, scruffy trains that constantly arrive late at dirty, scruffy stations; in which journeys are scandalously overpriced; and in which safety standards are among the world's worst. Where travellers opt for other forms of transport, they have to contend with mostly poor bus or underground services or are condemned to drive their cars on over-congested roads, badly constructed and in constant need of repair, while they are for ever penalised by rising road fund tax and petrol prices. While in the health service we suffer from inadequate privatisation, in the field of transport we have far too much. The privatisation of the railways has proved a fiasco, with shareholders' profits for ever coming before passenger convenience and safety. But even before this happened rail travel was a nightmare for millions. We have been talking about these things for years, and there are plenty of bright ideas for improvement. We observe how other countries manage things better, but that is all we ever do: observe – and complain.

VICTIMS OF GOVERNMENT INCOMPETENCE

These demonstrators are threatened with the loss of their livelihoods in businesses connected with the farming industry in Cumbria, now in dire peril as a result of the mishandling of the foot-and-mouth crisis.

Overview needed

What then can be done? It is at this point that we need to take a few paces back from our problems and endeavour to acquire a new focus – a kind of overview. Current debate, whether it be about transport, health, education or a host of other national sores, suffers from our being too close to the issues in question: too preoccupied by the details and the theory. What we should really be concerned about is the fact that after decades of awareness of things being badly wrong – decades of Tory governments as well as of Labour governments, decades of national 'leaders' of many types, decades of introspection and talk – these things have not improved but have only got worse. What has been lacking is action. What has prevailed is paralysis. Why have fine theories and intelligent criticism – which have been in ample supply – not been translated into clear policy, backed up by the will to get results?

There can only be two answers, both inter-linked: that our institutions are inadequate to the tasks, and that the people who rise through them just are not up to the job.

I was reminded of the latter problem on an occasion a few years back when I attended an election count. Our BNP contingent got into an argument with the Labour crowd (initiated by the latter, I might add). After hearing them talk for about twenty minutes, I was left wondering what there was where their brains were supposed to be. They were absolute cretins, almost every one of them. One doesn't mind a bit of disagreement when it is intelligently expressed; then one can have an interesting discussion, and even perhaps learn something. But the opposition of these creatures was the opposition of mentally backward yahoos. And they looked the idiots that they sounded. In due course we learned that some of them were borough councillors, no less! After seeing them and listening to them, we could easily work out why local services were at such abysmal levels, why almost nothing worked, why sacks of refuse piled up in the streets and neighbourhoods became so badly maintained. I have never allowed myself the dubious pleasure of being in the gallery at council meetings, but some of my friends have. They testify uniformly that the level of debate would discredit a rowdy kindergarten. We can of course watch and hear parliamentary proceedings now on television, and we find that even the 'élite' of the whole country are little better than the pathetic dwarfs who grace our chambers of local government. In the case of many of them, their private lives are as seedy and sordid as their contributions to national politics. These – believe it or not – are our governors. They make our laws and determine our destiny as a nation. When one sees and hears them in the flesh, one shudders at that thought. They are the lance corporals and privates – even at times the escapees from the guard house – who in a crazily dysfunctional army strut about in the uniforms of generals. No wonder we're where we are!

Britain's inefficient trains have been a national scandal for a long time, but nothing effective is ever done to put things right.

Needs of political reform

In The Eleventh Hour I pinpointed the problem. In a chapter headed 'The Political System' I listed some requirements essential for us to achieve good government, namely:-

"First and foremost, we must recruit into political life a much higher calibre of person than is the norm in British politics today. Currently, our men and women of public affairs are simply too small in both mind and character to be able to cope with the great issues with which they are confronted. Whatever means are required to elevate to the top those people with the highest leadership qualities must be adopted. In addition to this, politics must be given the status of a proper profession, which, as with other professions, people can only practise when they have obtained qualifications of proven competence.

"Government, once elected, must be given proper powers to act in accordance with the will of the people who have elected it. It must be immunised from the pressures of special sectional interest groups, particularly of finance, and be enabled to carry out, unhindered, the policies necessary to the nation's good.

"A way needs to be found to take party warfare out of politics. The nation cannot be governed well when a large faction in parliament has a vested interest in it being governed badly...

"Ministers in charge of the departments of government should be experts in their fields and not amateurs. To bring this about, it should be possible for them to be selected from the pool of managerial talent of the whole population, not solely from elected MPs."

Current politics in Britain constitute something of a vicious circle. Our political institutions are ancient, moth-eaten and designed for times long gone. In addition, today they are corrupt and wholly lacking in any spirit of patriotism or public service. An atmosphere of self-seeking cynicism pervades every corner, not unlike in the final days of Sovietism in Russia and Eastern Europe, when the ideals of the political Spring had long given way to the ethics of the apparatchik, who thought only of his place in the pecking order, his comrade's perks, his comfortable datcha and his pension; when the slogans of youth were parroted as before – but no longer with belief, only with the smirk of resignation and obsequiousness – a booking of tickets to security and (perhaps) honours.

Into this cesspit are sucked the meanest and smallest spirits of the times: the inadequate little people who in ordinary life would never rise above the status of minor clerks but whose breasts burst with egotism and ambition. They join political parties or trade unions and soon become important by taking on jobs that no-one else wants to do. Before long they have fancy titles which give them a grossly inflated sense of their own worth. After a little while on the gravy train, they learn that progress up the ladder depends on kissing the right backsides, and in every way and at all times reciting the 'correct' party line of the moment. In such careers genuine executive talent or leadership counts for little beside a mastery of the tricks of the party game: first the tricks of outbidding rivals for the approving eye of the party leader, then later the tricks of scoring points in debate against the political Opposition.

The virtues of subservience

In all this process, subservience is an essential attribute. Individuals of pride and honour, with minds of their own, cannot last five minutes in the political rat-race. Enoch Powell set a precedent for this more than thirty years ago, and the lesson has not been lost on his successors. Place-men and -women are what are required, and they are the kinds who come forward. In all this, ability counts for little.

Within parties, 'getting on' involves subservience to the party leader and sometimes to the party whips who enforce the leader's will. But once one gets to the very top subservience of another kind, and at another level, comes into play. The rising politician comes in time to understand that 'democracy' is just a racket and a front. Behind that front, wholly different forces are in command – forces not imagined by the little party-joiner who signs up for the first time and covets a seat on his branch committee. Very, very powerful people have to be appeased: billionaire financiers; press and TV barons who dwell in their own stratosphere of patronage and influence; political 'fixers' who operate in shady corners behind the scenes. In due course it is discovered that these people owe allegiance to no country; their stage is international and their loyalties are to 'World Order'. They feel no responsibility to electorates, which consist of mere productive workers and public servants whom they despise – except when such people are called upon to supply military cannon fodder for their ever more frequent globalist wars.

Only through inadequate political institutions could a person like him rise to prime ministerial rank.

Self-exclusion by the best

Men and women of genuine character and ability are repelled by the racket and want no part of it. They thus follow careers outside politics where they might do something useful for their country and people, and at the same time preserve their self-respect. So into the breach step the tadpoles of society, who by brown-nosing their way upwards can become government ministers, even premiers! Thus a creature like Tony Blair can attain the highest political rank, while around him assemble a band of no-hopers who are granted the distinction of being called a Cabinet! Then with that scenario created, jobs for the boys and girls are doled out like presents at a Christmas party. Loyalty in some past party emergency is not forgotten as one is given foreign affairs, another the chancellorship, yet another education, yet another health. Capability? Qualifications? Experience? You're joking! This is politics – moreover the politics of a liberal democracy!

In any public or private concern devoted to serious business, the incompetence of these kinds of people would quickly be spotted and they would be out on their ears. But in modern politics what counts is not competence but subservience, and also 'spin' – to be precise, the ability to appear more clever and more smart, more interesting and more glamorous, than the Opposition. If Britain currently had an Opposition of even moderate calibre, able to out-spin New Labour in these popularity stakes, Blair & Co. would have been kicked out last June. But what Britain has for 'Opposition' is the Tory Party! So Blair & Co. continue to get away with it while Britain continues to rot.

What we see here is a phenomenon not confined to this country; it prevails to one degree or another throughout the so-called 'free' world. Hence as Britain gets leaders like Blair and Major, the United States is afflicted with the likes of Bush and Clinton, France with Chirac and Germany with Schröder. Across the world – at least across the West – the giants have departed and the pygmies are in control. Britain is exceptional only in so far as the sickness here has taken on a particularly virulent form, and manifests itself in even greater political ineptitude than is demonstrated elsewhere. In these other countries a capacity still exists for running some public services with a modicum of intelligence and purpose. Here there are no such blessings. Here the inmates have more or less taken over the asylum, and nothing works but propaganda – the supreme achievement of 'Cool Britannia', the one industry that is in profit.

We shall not see improvement until we tackle the problems at first base. We must devise better institutions and we must recruit better leaders. Both are, as indicated earlier, mutually interdependent.

Precisely how we should do this and what new form the institutions should take is something that belongs to another study. First, we have to identify the problem before we can talk about the solution.

A noted New Labour backer who has paid over £5,000 for dinner tickets with the party's élite in just one year alone is David Alliance, now knighted. Born in Iran, Alliance left that country after complaining of 'persecution', just as did the Saatchi brothers in Iraq. The cynical might like to ask if the native people of this country haven't also suffered 'persecution' from the likes of the Saatchis via trash art, nauseating adverts and pernicious propaganda designed to get rubbish prime ministers elected.

Alliance is the Chairman of the N. Brown mail order group, and holds a third of the shares of the company, giving him a dividend income of £3.9 million a year. Until 1999, Alliance was the Chairman of Coats Viyella, the textiles group, and he still holds 12,000,000 shares in that company. While still in charge of Coats Viyella, the decidedly un-academic Alliance was given an honorary degree by the University of Liverpool on the same day as his firm made hundreds of job cuts in the Merseyside area. This must be one of the biggest blunders made by Liverpool University since the time it gave a honorary degree to 'Bomber Harris' just six months after the incineration of Dresden. Any sense of decency must fly out of the window as soon as donations are in the air!

The total family wealth of the Alliances is estimated to be not far short of £500 million.

David Alliance is a prominent member of the Israel-British Chamber of Commerce, whose board includes car tycoon Sir Trevor Chinn, formerly a Thatcher backer and now one of Tony's paymasters. Alliance also plays a role in The Israel Centre for Social and Economic Progress, a rather peculiar body devoted to bringing the benefits of Friedmanite economics to Israel itself. Though such policies have been imposed on goyishe nations for decades, Israel has never accepted the 'benefits' of rampant capitalism, anymore than it has accepted those of multi-culturalism. Among his fellow Friends of The Israel Centre for Social and Economic Progress are Tory Party Treasurer Stanley Kalms, New Labour donor Maurice Hatter and even convicted fraudster Gerald Ronson. Other interesting Friends include Sir Leslie Porter, husband of Tesco heiress Shirley Porter and Walter Goldsmith. I.B.

The following is an edited version of a talk given by Dr. William L. Pierce on the radio programme American Dissident Voices. The opening passages of Dr. Pierce's talk have had to be deleted because a number of references in them would be in violation of laws in Britain which make it a criminal offence to comment unfavourably on specific racial groups, and in later parts of the talk we have had to make odd deletions or amendments for the same reason. In the opening passages Dr. Pierce builds up to his main theme, which is that of how he believes the organised Jewish community in the United States should view with concern the flooding of the country by ethnic groups, such as Mexicans and Asians, whom it may not be possible to assimilate into the mainstream population but who are likely to establish and expand their own distinct communities. The issue has direct relevance to our situation in Britain, where presently there is an ongoing debate between the adherents of 'multi-culturalism' and 'multi-racialism', upon which we have focused in this month's What We Think column. We take up Dr. Pierce's drift at the point at which he puts the spotlight on a paper produced by a prominent spokesman for American Jewry

I'll give you a concrete example. And, really, the only way to deal with a subject like this is to study concrete examples: many concrete examples; to look at the details. My example today is a recent paper written for the Centre for Immigration Studies by Dr. Stephen Steinlight. Dr. Steinlight spent more than five years as the director of national affairs for the American Jewish Committee. He's certainly no fringe Jew, but is right at the core of Jewish power. His paper, which you can find for yourself on the Internet at cis.org, is titled 'The Jewish Stake in America's Changing Demography'. It is a paper written by a Jewish leader primarily for his fellow Jews, and so is perhaps a bit more revealing of Jewish attitudes than it would be if it were addressed to the general public instead.

The general theme of Steinlight's message is that US immigration policy, as it stands today, is not as favourable to Jewish interests as it might be. In fact, he sees some real dangers for his fellow Jews if immigration policy isn't changed soon. The main danger he sees is the loss of the Jewish ability to control the US government. Now, he indicates, the Jews have a tight grip on things; through their control of the media they are able to control public opinion. But, he frets, with so many diverse races pouring across the US borders so fast, and with the new immigrants retaining their own racial loyalties instead of assimilating into the cosmopolitan mass of the general public, the Jews may lose their grip. When more than half of the US population becomes non-white during the next 30 or 40 years, if the various minorities still have any sort of their separate identities.

Well, that's Steinlight's message in broad outline, which is interesting in itself; but it's in the details of the way in which he says it that we can see his deception. I can't read Steinlight's whole paper to you, because it's 26 pages long; but I'll try to give you the general flavour with just a few excerpts. For example, he carries on for pages about how wonderful democracy is – the will of the people, equality, and all that – and how important it is to preserve democracy. And then on page seven he says, and I quote: "Is the emerging new multi-cultural American nation good for the Jews? Will a country in which enormous demographic and cultural change, fuelled by unceasing large-scale non-European immigration, remain one in which Jewish life will continue to flourish as nowhere else in the history of the Diaspora? In an America in which people of color form the plurality, as has already happened in California, most with little or no historical experience with or knowledge of Jews, will Jewish sensitivities continue to enjoy extraordinarily high levels of deference and will Jewish interests continue to receive special protection? Does it matter that the majority of non-European immigrants have no historical experience of the Holocaust or knowledge of the persecution of Jews over the ages and see Jews only as the most privileged and powerful of White Americans?" (end of quote).

You really need to read that statement over two or three times and let it sink in to get the full impact: to realize that Steinlight has just announced that Jewish interests get special protection because Americans want to make up for the persecutions they have been led to believe that Jews suffered more than 50 years ago during the so-called 'Holocaust'; that it is dangerous to let immigrants in who haven't been indoctrinated with 'Holocaust' propaganda, because they might see Jews for what they really are, namely, the most privileged and powerful group in America. But how nicely Steinlight says that: how smoothly!

Well, Steinlight goes on to complain that Jews already are losing some of their power. He mentions the Jews in the Congress who have been replaced by Asians and Hispanics, and he asks whether Jews can hope ever again to have ten Jewish senators, as they do now, if present immigration trends continue. We should note that if the Jews were represented in the Senate in proportion to their percentage of the population there would be only two Jewish senators now instead separate group identities, the Jews may no longer be able to control the outcome of elections.

CONTROLLING THE FLOW

The way around this danger, according to Steinlight, is not to halt non-white immigration. Instead it is to shift the make-up of the immigrant flow in a way so as to make it easier for the Jews to control them and to slow the flow if necessary, so that the new immigrants can be integrated into the mass – and controlled along with the mass – rather than retaining of ten. And then Steinlight asks, and I quote: "How long do we actually believe that nearly 80 per cent of the entire foreign aid budget of the United States will go to Israel?"

FROM THE HORSE'S MOUTH

Steinlight says, and again I quote: "Not that it is the case that our disproportionate political power (pound for pound the greatest of any ethnic/cultural group in America) will erode all at once, or even quickly. We will be able to hang on to it for perhaps a decade or two longer. Unless and until the triumph of campaign finance reform is complete, an extremely unlikely scenario, the great material wealth of the Jewish community will continue to give it significant advantages. We will continue to court and be courted by key figures in Congress." (end of quote).

Steinlight's paper is really fascinating reading. He says all of the typical, mealy-mouthed things about democracy and equality and so on, sounding like a true-blue, public-spirited, patriotic American – and then he lets slip the real reason why many Jews love democracy so much: it is because their wealth gives them such an advantage. And gradually one begins to understand that, as Steinlight sees it, the Jews' whole concern about immigration and politics is Jewish power: that's all that he believes concerns them. And Steinlight actually communicates that message to his fellow Jews, but he heaps on so much obfuscation that the average Gentile will never get it.

'DIVIDE AND CONQUER'

Here's another little gem from Steinlight's paper. After mentioning how rapidly the political power of the Hispanic segment of the US population is growing and how racially self-conscious this segment is, Steinlight says, and again I quote: "For perhaps another generation, an optimistic forecast, the Jewish community is thus in a position where it will be able to divide and conquer and enter into selective coalitions that support our agendas." (end of quote). Did you catch that bit about "divide and conquer"? Of course, that was the motive driving the Zionists' campaign for the new immigration law in 1965 that brought in the flood of non-white immigrants who have so drastically darkened America in recent decades, and it is the motive behind the Zionists' insistence now that our borders be kept open and that the government do virtually nothing to halt illegal immigration. The motive from the beginning was to dilute White political strength, to multi-culturalize America, so that Whites couldn't gang up on the Zionists: so that the 2.5 per cent of the population that is Jewish could continue to control the other 97.5 per cent that is not Jewish.

And Steinlight admits the virtual Jewish unanimity on the immigration question as well as the decisive role Jews have had in shaping the US government's immigration policy, but his admission is cloaked in all of the standard mush about sympathy for the underdog and how the Jews always have been against racism and so on.

But now, Steinlight is telling his fellow Jews: now is the time for us to change America's immigration policy again, so that we Jews can continue to hang on to our power. We need to have fewer Muslim immigrants and others we are less likely to be able to control, and we need to slow immigration down so that the new non-white immigrants can lose their own sense of identity, shed the influences from their home countries, and become fully 'Americanised' – which means fully subject to Jewish control through the mass media.

And Steinlight comes right out and says how that control is to be exercised. He says – quote – "It is also true that Jewish economic influence and power are disproportionately concentrated in Hollywood, television, and in the news industry." And then, a few pages later, after saying some very unkind things about Muslims, he tells us – quote – "I suspect that MTV, for better or for worse, will prove more powerful with young Muslim immigrants than the mullahs..." What is that if not gloating over his fellow Zionists' power to capture and control the minds of non-Jews, even to wean young Muslims away from their religion, away from the influence and guidance of their own spiritual leaders, through the Zionists' control of the media? He doesn't have to spell it out. It's already known that MTV is owned by the billionaire Jew Sumner Redstone, born Murray Rothstein, and that the whole aim of MTV propaganda is to multi-culturalise young Americans, to cut them loose from their own racial and cultural and religious roots and make rootless cosmopolitans of them, with no sense of racial identity or loyalty. The Zionists know all of this, but the Gentiles listening to Steinlight will never get it. To communicate the way Steinlight does takes a special ability.

GENTILES BAFLED

I'll say this again: people like Steinlight are able to get away with making such brazen statements because they fuzz them over with lots of contradictory verbiage that keeps the Gentiles trying to figure it out. The Jews in Steinlight's audience read his message loud and clear, while the non-Jews sit there with idiotic smiles on their faces and applaud, having understood nothing at all. I chose Steinlight's recent paper to illustrate this because Steinlight is a policy-making Jew with unquestionable credentials, and because the paper is available to anyone with access to the Internet at cis.org.

For those listeners without Internet access, Steinlight's core message to his fellow Jews is this: "We Jews are richer and more powerful than any other group in America. Our power is concentrated in the media. We always have pushed for more non-white immigration into America because we wanted to dilute the power of the White majority. We used the tactic of divide and rule. But now, with America becoming non-white so rapidly, our open-borders policy is likely to begin working against our own Jewish interests. We are not able to control large ethnic minorities who maintain their separate identities as easily as we can control those who have given up their identities and become fully assimilated into the mass. In the future we probably can continue to use our media, such as MTV, to undermine the culture of new immigrants and integrate them into the American mass, but in order to be sure of doing this we need to slow the rate of immigration a bit, skew the immigration quotas more toward those who are not hostile to Jews, and speed up programmes aimed at assimilation. And we should be especially sure that we indoctrinate new immigrants with lots of 'Holocaust' propaganda, so that they will feel guilty if they don't let us have our way and keep our special privileges."

EXPLOITING CHRISTIAN GUILT

That's Steinlight's message. It's simple enough, but being delivered the way it is makes it fiendishly deceptive. And lest you think I'm exaggerating or distorting his message by paraphrasing it, I should quote exactly what he says on page 18 of his paper, where he explains how Zionists are able to get away with claiming to be loyal to America while actually being loyal to Israel. He says – quote – "We get a free pass, I suspect, largely over Christian guilt about the Holocaust..." But he pads that bald statement with a warning to his fellow Zionists that they'd better be more careful not to flaunt their 'free pass' and had better try harder to seem patriotic.

There's one area of Steinlight's paper that gives additional insight into his mode of deception, and that's his commentary on Muslims, whom he regards as an especially problematic group of immigrants. I'll quote for you exactly what he says first about Muslim fundamentalists and then about Muslims generally, beginning on page 21 of his paper. Muslim fundamentalism is, he says, and I quote – "a totalitarian political ideology with strong theocratic and fascist elements..." He goes on to say – quote – "Islamism is profoundly hostile to pluralism, religious tolerance, democracy, secular civil society, Jews, Zionism, [and] Israel..." He complains about Muslim fundamentalism's – quote – "intolerant religiosity, irrational atavistic values, [and] misogyny."

Gee! What other Semitic religion does that description remind me of? Except for the bit about hostility toward Jews, Zionism, and Israel, what he says about Islam describes Orthodox Judaism perfectly. And there's much more. Steinlight complains about the multiplicity of Islamic social and religious organisations in the United States and how they all stick up for each other. And – get this – he actually complains that Muslims, when criticized or questioned, raise the – quote – "red herring of Islamophobia." How noble and honest it is of the Zionists that they never raise the red herring of anti-Semitism to deflect criticism from themselves!

But that is only the beginning of Steinlight's arrogance and deception. The traditional Islamic faith, he says – and I quote – “is itself not unproblematic in its attitudes toward Jews, Christians, and other non-Muslims. The religious education of traditional, non-Islamist Muslims – literalism in Koranic exegesis, theological straightjackets imposed on scriptural interpretation, the study of text without context, and the virtual absence of intellectual self-critique – is filled with anti-Jewish teaching as well as a theology of contempt for the followers of other faiths... Powerful strains of religious triumphalism and religious supercessionism are central tenets of Islam. Such dangerous spiritual arrogance has been abandoned by many Christian denominations, largely as a product of Vatican II and years of inter-faith dialogue and soul-searching encounter. Christian believers, from Roman Catholics to members of such liberal Protestant denominations as the Congregationalists and the United Church of Christ, have, for example, adopted the view that God’s covenantal relationship with the Jewish people remains unbroken and that the advent of Christianity neither erased nor cancelled it... No parallel spiritual generosity exists in Islam.” (end of quote)

Well, sadly, all of that is perfectly true, and it is a wonderful example of how a clever liar can use the truth to tell a monstrous lie. It also is an example of a breathtaking height of arrogance.

There’s much more I could say about such things as the way in which the Zionists used such techniques as ‘inter-faith dialogue’ to completely vitiate Christianity and make the Christian churches into obedient lapdogs, but I don’t want to offend my Christian friends any more than I already have. Study Steinlight’s paper for yourself and see where it leads you.

The Band of Brothers: a contrary viewpoint

IN SEPTEMBER 1998 I organised a press visit to a new factory built on the site of the large World War II airfield at Membury, Wiltshire. The patriotic owners of the site decided to retain the old Control Tower within the factory, as it was from there that mainly American – plus some British – airborne took off in September 1944 for the ill-conceived Operation Market Garden to capture the Rhine bridges at Arnhem and Nijmegen.

The opening ceremony was attended by wartime veterans from the American 101st Airborne, the Screaming Eagles, and the British 6th Airborne, together with an RAF Colour Party from RAF Lineham, who towered over a USAAF Colour Party comprising three 5ft 2in Mexican-origin Americans and a spotty-faced young blonde lady. In a moving ceremony, the 6ft, watery blue-eyed spokesman for the veterans of the 101st Airborne read out some fifty names of comrades who fell in the American part of the operation. With one exception, every name was of Anglo-Celtic origin. The exception was German.

The experience has stayed in my memory, and when I read that the BBC was going to show Band of Brothers, based on the war-time experience of the 101st Airborne’s Easy Company, I decided to watch it. I think I must have watched a different version to that seen by Michael Walsh (in the article downloaded from his website and published in abridged form in the December Spearhead).

Of course, there were distortions and bias, as to be expected from most film-makers and from Stephen Spielberg in particular, but I cannot see how Michael Walsh justifies his claim, by quoting unnamed war veterans and military historians, that the series was “a fantasy, a total travesty from beginning to end, a pack of lies and a vainglorious re-writing of history.” The overall impression he gives is that the American soldiers in the campaign in North West Europe in 1944-45, and the 101st Airborne in particular, were a cowardly, bungling army who managed to defeat the German Army (certainly the best in the world at that time) by a combination of luck, over whelming air power, and a bit of help from the British and the Russians (who in fact did most of the fighting in World War II). This is simply not true. Mr. Walsh splits hairs when he points out that Easy Company of the 101st did not lead the attack on Carantan (whose German defenders had been told by Rommel to fight to the last man). It was another company of the 101st. So what? That’s film directors for you – exercising a bit of licence.

Then Mr. Walsh gets to Arnhem (Operation Market Garden). He shows his prejudices when he says: “Paratroopers did manage to capture some bridges and towns near the Dutch town of Arnhem before the Germans forced their retreat.” The objective of the risky plan was to take the bridges at Nijmegen, Eindhoven and above all Arnhem to enable the British 21st Army Group and the American 1st Army to cross the Rhine into Germany. The American Screaming Eagles quickly took Eindhoven; and, Mr Walsh, they eventually held on to it, admittedly with reinforcements (including British) from adjacent allied-held territory. The British 6th Airborne was given the very difficult task of capturing Arnhem, the “bridge too far.” Such was the cock-up of our intelligence that they were dropped among the 9th SS Panzer Division, who, unbeknown to us, were there for R & R (rest and recreation). The film acknowledges the British difficulties.

Surprisingly, Mr. Walsh makes no mention of Bastogne, which was held by the 101st US Airborne for ten days while completely surrounded by crack Panzer Grenadiers of General Model’s Army Group B during the ‘Battle of the Bulge’, in December 1944. The Screaming Eagles were finally rescued by the US 3rd Army under General Patton (who incidentally was recognised by the German Generals as the best commander in either the British or American armies).

I agree with Michael Walsh that it seems incredulous that the BBC would pay £6m for the TV broadcasting rights for a film designed for American audiences. The British contribution to the campaign is hardly mentioned, perhaps understandably as the series was about Easy Company of the 101st. Mr. Walsh’s comment about the latter’s behaviour towards French women is very apt, and, contrary to brain-washed ‘public opinion’, the French found that the German soldiers were far better behaved – with the British somewhere in the middle! I also agree with him that Spielberg’s prejudices show through when he switches from unintentionally showing how good the German Army was as a fighting force to indulging in some ‘beastly Hun’ propaganda. Nevertheless, there were some moments when the film series did acknowledge the courage and fighting qualities of the German soldier of that time. This is particularly so in the final part when Easy Company’s CO allows a surrendering German officer to keep his side-arm and “not hand it over to some damn desk clerk.” This is followed by a moving scene where, after the German surrender on May 8th 1945, we are given an English translation by one of the cast of the speech made by a German General to his men. He thanks them for their courage and dedication, their loyalty over six years and their sufferings in the East, and he says how proud he was to have them as comrades.

Finally, may I say that those men who fought and died in the 101st Airborne at that time were far removed from the unisex, multi-racial retards that seem to make up much of the American armed forces in films set in the modern era. They were more like the Special Forces troops that America has just used in Afghanistan – who seem no different from our own SAS, or the British 6th Airborne and the German Grenadiers of “the old days.”

FROM top to bottom, the administration of the European Union is riddled with fraud, corruption and incompetence. Billions of pounds disappear down the drain, through either outright fiddling or the pursuit of lunatic projects which benefit nobody. And the scandals which actually come to light are, of course, just the tip of the iceberg. Again, it must be remembered that, even if everything about the EU were whiter than white – which certainly it is not – the thing is nothing more than a colossal gravy train, an absurd and ultra-expensive extra layer of government which spends most of its time interfering with the affairs of member states.

What does it do for us?

A couple of years ago a journalist offered a magnum of champagne to any europhile who could cite an instance where Britain had derived some tangible benefit from being a member of the EU. A few weeks later he was able to announce smugly that his offer had cost him nothing. The fact is that neither the politicians nor their publicists can point to a single advantage that has accrued to our people over 28 years in the 'club'. Oddly enough, however, TV interviewers rarely ask ministers the embarrassing question: "What has membership done for the UK?" It looks very much as though they are all part of the plot to finish us off, and we know that their bosses most certainly are.

And what has been the cost?

On the debit side, this country has abandoned Commonwealth Preference, given away our valuable fisheries and chucked billions into the Common Agricultural Policy and dozens of other daft schemes: billions that should have been used to assist our own farmers and market gardeners. Is it surprising that the Spanish, Italians, Greeks and Southern Irish can hardly believe their luck when we dole out the freebies? And soon we will be subsidising the economies of the many Eastern European states already queuing up for the hand-outs. Moreover, it needs to be mentioned that, as these 'grants' normally pass through the hands of three different lots of often grossly overpaid civil servants, there is little left of the pound that was there in the beginning, by the time it reaches its final destination.

The coming Referendum on the 'euro'

The problem with emotive slogans such as 'Keep our Pound' or 'Save the Pound' is that, however well meant they may be, they tend to depict sterling as some sort of revered totem or as an endangered species. This plays straight into the hands of the enemy, who is able to label us as political dinosaurs still living in a bygone age, and unable to accept the modern world. In my own view, if people are unable to get the gist of the politico/economic argument for keeping our own currency then they should probably not be voting at all. And, very simply it is this:

embracing the euro will put the last nail in Britain's coffin, if I may use my own emotive slogan. We lose our central bank and with it the right to set our own interest rates. Next, whatever Brown and Blair may say, harmonisation of taxes will follow, and this will effectively reduce the status of our Parliament at Westminster to that of a borough council. When we can no longer manage our own economy, we have abandoned even the pretence of preserving sovereignty, and whoever says otherwise is a liar.

How the game will be played

The pundits say that Blair cannot afford to lose a referendum on joining the single currency because he would lose face. He might, but that, of itself, would not mean curtains for the Labour Government. The Lib-Dems are equally committed to the destruction of Britain and, as we have seen, the ambiguous Tory policy of 'wait-and-see' cut no ice at the last general election. Thus, even if a majority votes to retain the Pound, it does not follow that the discredited Conservative Party will pick up support. Even so, because Blair would lose credibility (though not necessarily power) both here and abroad if the euro were rejected, we can bank on facing a slick propaganda machine which will be churning out misleading figures, half-truths and downright lies on a scale not seen since the treacherous Heath government took us into what was then the Common Market in 1973. Behind the scenes, straw-poll analysts will advise the PM when the 'yes' vote is likely to peak; Gordon Brown, or whoever is then Chancellor, will chip in with some rot about our being on track towards economic convergence, and the show will be on the road.

An unfortunate delusion

Although securing a 'no' vote is crucial, it is necessary to dispel a misconception as to what that will actually achieve in the longer term. Many gullible folk believe that if we reject the single currency then somehow we will never be completely suffocated by the Brussels boa constrictor, that somehow the residual powers retained will serve us in perpetuity against national extinction. In fact, it is possible that the enemy will be quite happy to let us bask in the euphoria of winning a skirmish, when his forces are dictating the course of the engagement across the broader front. This is so because, inexorably, the super-state, with its own law-makers, its own army, its own police force, its own central bank and, by 2004, its own constitution, will continue to destroy our freedoms whether we embrace the euro or not. And Britain, maybe only a few years down the road, will submissively roll onto its back and abandon the Pound because we will be told we quite simply have nowhere else to go. That is, of course, if we get a 'no' vote and do nothing, instead of using that 'no' vote as a springboard for national resurgence and a bid for freedom.

HAPPINESS
Britain can, and must, shake off the Brussels boa constrictor, says COLIN VERNON

How it all happened

Let us first consider how we came to be a member of the EU. Following our entry into the Common Market mentioned above, we had the 1975 referendum, held under a Labour Government, which endorsed Britain's membership by a majority of more than 2 to 1. Our people were told, and the bulk of them believed, that being in this duty-free zone would work wonders for the economy; that British exports would enjoy the benefit of this vast market. No hint was given of a Commission that could make all kinds of laws binding on us, and that the ultimate aim was political union. Then came the 1986 Single European Act, which took integration a stage further, and finally the Treaty on European Union (The Maast-richt Treaty) which came into effect in 1993, rather than 1992, because the Danes got it 'wrong' the first time and had to have a second referendum. This, it may be recalled, was the Treaty that Britain's Chancellor of the Exchequer did not bother to read!

Now, if it was necessary to hold a referendum here in 1975, it was most certainly necessary to hold referenda on the subsequent dates I have mentioned. After all, the entire concept had changed. Heath, lying through his teeth, had assured the people that sovereignty would not be affected, and now, here we are, with countless aspects of our everyday life controlled by a faceless European Commission, headed up by political failures.

How we can escape

In simple terms, there can be no argument against the contention that our membership of the EU is invalid. The politicians who signed away our right to govern ourselves did this without any authority whatsoever, and their signatures on these scraps of paper are worthless. That then would be my first choice as a cause for opting out. But – and I suspect that many astute euro-philosophes know this – their precious European Union is so shakily founded that a workmanlike government, sitting up all night with a couple of sharp lawyers, could discover any number of instances where British law, and for that matter the Treaty of Rome itself, has been conveniently disregarded by the European empire-builders. Remember that, time and time again, our own parliamentary draftsmen, as they are known, have made such a bodge of drawing up legislation that the courts have made them and their masters a laughing stock. Lastly, let us be pragmatic. We are here, and Brussels is there. When an entire nation has been betrayed it need not be too fussy about how it sets things to rights!

But won't we suffer afterwards?

Perhaps the biggest of all the Blair lies is that Britain needs Europe. The simple fact is that Europe needs us much more! Can we really suppose that, on the day we quit, the flow of bacon, lettuces, tomatoes, butter, wine, canned olives and automobiles, etc., etc., will really dry up? Of course it won't! For a start there would be a spate of bankruptcies in Holland if it did.

On the other hand, it is true that, spared from its crippling contributions to the EU, Britain will be able to lavish a few incentives on its own producers so that, over time, we will produce far more lettuce and bacon and motor vehicles and consequently import less. But, if Britain plays the Johnny Reb, will not the EU impose swingeing tariffs on our goods? That seems to be very doubtful if VW, Renault and Fiat, to name but a few, are keen to keep a share of the British market. The truth is that, on the day we leave, they will all be falling over themselves to negotiate the best deal they can get.

THE EURO JUGGERNAUT

SOON TO RULE OVER US

The European Parliament in Brussels (seen above) is assuming more and more power to legislate for Britain. If the Euro fanatics have their way, it will reduce our own Parliament to the status of a borough council.

And the benefits?

After the applause from the rest of the world has died down, there will be many things needing attention. Our fisheries were illegally surrendered and will have to be recovered. However, a sensible government might well introduce a permit system by which, under strict control and the payment of substantial fees, foreign fishermen would be allowed into our waters, the funds collected from them being applied to assist our own fishermen, who have suffered so much under the heel of the Brussels dictatorship.

Again, all the EU-sponsored legislation endorsed by our Parliament would need to be reversed and opportunity taken to introduce a new legal code which would restore liberty to our folk and enshrine the right to freedom of speech. But, above all this, we will have regained our dignity and our self-esteem. What a miracle – to be able to look one another in the face and shout to the rooftops that we're British and free!

Epilogue

And who knows? Our defection could presage the total collapse of this monstrous edifice whose mandarins have had the effrontery to steal the glorious melody from Beethoven's ninth symphony and use it as a 'Euro-anthem'. God grant that we may listen in peace and prosperity to that wonderful setting of Schiller's Ode to Joy long after the European Union and all its hateful works have turned to dust!

FED ON GUILT AND ILLUSION

IAN BUCKLEY reflects on how modern white populations are controlled

IF YOU WAIT long enough, even the most unlikely characters will come out with sensible comments. Thus Peter Hain remarked recently that 'war is brutal' when the news came of the total annihilation of Taliban prisoners at the Mazar-e-Sharif fortress. Now call me an old cynic if you like, but I don't think that this glimmer of understanding will be extended past excusing the atrocities of New World Order henchmen.

How times change! Once Peter Hain was organising demonstrations if any South African cop trod on Joe Slovo's big toe, but now he's the apologist for brutal slaughter. A worthy member of one of our most contemptible governments ever, don't you think?

But only the foolish would expect any understanding to be extended to the likes of Anthony Sawoniuk, a half-blind, deaf octogenarian locked up for the rest of his life on fairly dubious evidence of 'war crimes'.

In this case it's well to remember that the authorities who admitted him after the war would have done a basic background check which would surely have uncovered any participation in atrocities. To me it is both weird and bizarre that an old man should have been carted off to jail under lately made-up laws, after peacefully spending 40 years working for British Rail without so much as lunging with his ticket punch at a stropky passenger. While the Israeli F-16s bomb and strafe built-up areas, this aged 'war criminal' is kept in a little cell, the victim of one of the final acts of the Thatcher government.

DOUBLE STANDARDS

It's just the way of the world, isn't it? Some must be perpetually excused while others have their noses rubbed in it over and over again. And those who fondly imagine that such 'war crimes' trials will come to an end when there are no more aged veterans of the armies of the Third Reich left may have another think coming. In a recent decision, the Canadians deported a teenage 'war criminal' Robert Rauliak just because he was the grandson of a deceased cook with an anti-partisan regiment in the Ukraine! This deportation may form the basis for further legal action against descendants of alleged 'war criminals' under the Multi-Cultural Justice Act, a piece of legislation whose supposed function is to protect "designated ethnic groups." But that obviously doesn't include Ukrainians!

We've lost our senses. If we were still sane, such headlines would never be written, except on April Fools' Day. The process of conditioning, control and suppression of personality begins very early. When a civilisation is flourishing, it's quite desirable that a high proportion of the populace should be obedient conformists. But today submission and conservatism lead to self-destruction.

Studying the browbeaten inhabitants of Blair's benighted Britain – the tatty outpost of the global empire of usury – I can only concur with George Bernard Shaw when he commented that young people should look to their parents, not as an example but as a warning.

An entire generation of politicians, industrialists, journalists, social 'scientists' and economic theorists stand indicted for the stupidity and cupidity which has wrecked our nation. Only the white race could be so foolish as to cast away its great achievements and embrace failure, self-doubt and twilight. The immigrant Muslims who want nothing to do with such a society of decadence and money-grubbing do have a point. With race coming back on the agenda, the New Labour gang have come out with the ridiculous idea that a pledge of allegiance, recited by immigrants, will somehow solve every race-related problem.

How might such an oath – truthfully – run? Something like: "We pledge allegiance to the Mini Britain of New Labour, one fractured and divided nation under Money, the fawning poodle of the US; our industry mostly gone or sold to foreigners, while our officialdom boasts of our economic success; the nation that goes to war abroad while decent folk fear to walk the streets after dark at home; whose old people die of cold each winter, while semi-literate footballers make millions."

Richard Wagner summed up the essential characteristics of the pseudo-democracy of press and hired politicians which now belabours us: "It looks humane, but is barbarous. The people sink lower and lower."

WHITES HAVE 'BLOWN IT'

The Australian Aborigines make the best of what they have, as they've done for thousands of years. But we've had it all, and we've just about 'blown it'. In evolutionary terms, which racial grouping is less fit to survive? Our passivity and herd-like submissiveness have led us to the edge of the abyss.

We need youth who will stand up and rebel against being spoon-fed with the poison which makes them ashamed of what they are. The 'message' films that come out of Hollywood: what do they say? In subtle but unmistakable terms, that all men – especially white heterosexual men – are scumbags, who would do the world a favour if they crawled into a hole and died!

Well, this particular white heterosexual male has no intention of crawling into a hole and dying, thank you very much! But the media propagandists have their work cut out today. Too many are beginning to realise the essential rottenness of the system. Too many are beginning to ask inconvenient questions.

SCARE TACTICS

As a consequence, exposés of what might be called the exotic fringes of the nationalist movement are pretty thick on the ground today – to scare off the timid, you understand? One recent Daily Mail piece by Christopher Hudson was a classic of its kind. This featured characters like "Andy (the Nightmare) Frain, a thick-set man with huge fists." Mr. Frain sounds very much like John Prescott, the hulking Labour bruiser, who I note has had a very low public profile since his last boxing bout!

Likewise: "... leading ideologue David Myatt was a middle-aged Nazi supremacist with a ginger beard who worshipped Satan in the nude in front of an altar adorned with black candles, a swastika banner and a framed photograph of the Führer." Don't we all know that no exposé is worth its salt unless it includes Adolf? Predictable, I suppose, but essential to make a good story and sell papers!

The salient point to be made here is that the 'villains' exposed by Christopher Hudson are harmless compared to the real monsters of our time, who incidentally get kid-glove treatment from the media – like Ariel Sharon and the Northern Alliance warlords.

Though our means are non-violent, we are indeed engaged in a struggle for the future, a sort of war: a war indeed, but a war of information and enlightenment alone. And make no mistake, we intend to win!

NICK GRIFFIN, chairman of the British National Party, wrote in this journal two months ago of "making friendly contact with a number of Sikhs and Hindus who favour British survival." This is fanciful thinking. Even though these people may be anti-Muslim, they naturally have more in common with other Asian racial groups than with the ethnic British. The party will simply be ensnared into some kind of waffly cultural dialogue.

And what about the Blacks? All coloured people living in Britain themselves have come from civic territorial states, and have no ethnic nor cultural links with this country. Many – almost half – do not even have British passports (this factor is often overlooked when there is talk of 'ethnic minorities'). They thus have enormous identity and legitimacy problems. They either have to admit this or deny it, but going into denial means that they are liable to become evasive, and this will affect other aspects of their day-to-day behaviour. 'Truth' will mean what they want it to mean, and totalitarian methods of thinking emanating from the minorities in this country are already seeping into the wider community.

What kind of links?

Bear in mind that any links the BNP will try to foster will not be with the 'ethnic minorities' but just with particular individuals who may or may not have just claim to be spokesmen and representatives. And these are the very people the party should want nothing to do with unless they have a complete change of attitude and agree to do everything possible to halt further immigration on the terms dictated by the ethnic British.

At the moment, none of the community leaders seems to make friendly or conciliatory remarks about the British, let alone about groups like the BNP. None of them of which I am aware acts as if he or she has any affection for this country; quite the opposite: they jab accusing fingers; they are baleful and reproachful in their public utterances; they often speak spitefully against our nation. None of them has said they want immigration halted.

Most come from cultures that have an uneven experience of free opinion and a free press. The media exist in many countries only to be manipulated, controlled and used as propaganda. It is precisely because the minorities are part of the way to getting our own media actually to believe that the Whites in Britain are in some sense 'immigrants' themselves that nationalists should act with the utmost caution in any dealings with them. There is a danger that the BNP will be regarded as spokesmen for just another tribe, as if somehow we are Pashtuns and they are Tajiks.

Since ethnic minorities know that their colour hints of their national origins, they have shrewdly got liberal cliques in the media to use the hate-associated word 'racism' in the most venomous way: to intimidate all those who oppose further immigration, thus undermining the human rights of people.

We must not forget the way in which powerful ethnic leaders pressured the foolish Lord Macpherson to brand all British institutions as 'institutionally racist'. The heads of the police, the fire brigade, the Royal College of Nurses, the BNP beware!

ANTONY MILNE warns of the dangers of liaison with ethnic minority groups

TRUCKLING TO THE MINORITIES
Tory and Labour leaders Hague and Blair are seen here signing pledges not to use the 'race card' in last year's general election. When the 'ethnic' communities have got the parties of power in the palms of their hands, why should they want anything to do with the BNP?

Army and others have jumped on the bandwagon and slandered their own members as 'racist' in cowardly and morally putrid moves that have done enormous harm to morale in these bodies.

Identity chaos

Ethnic minorities have a very high profile in this country compared to those in other European countries. The resulting identity chaos that is fast engulfing us has to be reined in, and the BNP must do its utmost here. For this reason, the party ought not to get drawn into the debate about 'multi-racialism', 'multi-culturalism' or 'separate development', and thus add to the confusion. It would be pointless to make contacts with ethnic leaders without any consensus from them about whom they think they are and what they think Britain is or should be. Judging by the vast number of Muslim organisations and cultural movements springing up, it is clear that Asians do not entirely regard themselves as British. Virtually every large city in Britain now has its Council of Community Relations run by Asians. This iron grip must be loosened, and the minorities must defer to the nationalist movement and agree to do this.

Both Labour and Conservatives are themselves not clear about the race and identity issue. Many local councils encourage 'celebration of diversity' and ethnic festivals. They publish leaflets in a multitude of languages. But some on the left see this as some kind of apartheid, and want everyone to learn English, dress in western clothes and generally blend in. The Tories are more likely to say this, but are themselves confused. Elder spokesmen such as Lord Tebbit and Sir Richard Body want the minorities simply to become 'British' in some kind of political sense: "Get rid of your garb, speak English and support England."

Advice to the BNP: steer well clear!

FRIENDS OF SPEARHEAD

Friends of Spearhead is a support group that has been formed for the purpose of ensuring our magazine's continued survival in new circumstances in which it is going to be facing reduced sales and advertising through the British National Party network due to the decision of the party leadership to launch a new and separate magazine.

Members of Friends of Spearhead will be asked to pay a subscription of a minimum of £10 a month, in return for which they may, if they wish, receive five copies of each monthly issue for redistribution (by whatever means they prefer). This subscription may be paid by ordinary cheque or by direct debit, in which case details of our bank and account number will be supplied on request.

In addition, Friends of Spearhead will be undertaking certain other promotions, details of which will be advertised as they occur.

We hope very much that our readers and supporters, not only in the UK but around the world, will rally to help us in this new project.

Friends of Spearhead can be contacted at our usual address: PO Box 2471, Hove, E. Sussex BN3 4DT.

A sense of belonging

IN the latest outburst of liberal inanity the Home Secretary has urged ethnic minorities to acquire a greater sense of belonging in Britain.

As a former management consultant, I recall being all too frequently obliged to give some highly-opinionated but deluded people a blinding glimpse of the obvious. Such habits are hard to break, so here I am again to tell the Home Secretary and all his kind that the reason why the ethnic minorities feel no sense of belonging in Britain is that they do not belong here. They know this, and so do most of the native population. Oh sure, they can learn to speak English well enough to get by from one transaction to the next, just as I once learned quite a lot of Arabic as a matter of personal expediency. But no-one took me for an Arab, any more than they did Lawrence of Arabia. Likewise, no-one will ever mistake the broadcaster Trevor Macdonald for a Highland clansman, however well-groomed his appearance and diction.

'Belonging', you see, is a very deeply-rooted and complex condition. One can be treated most hospitably in almost any community without thereby belonging to it in any real sense of the word. And simply acquiring a feeling of belonging will never be enough to make it a reality, since that is only within the gift of the host community – and then not as an official diktat but at every face-to-face encounter with the community's natural members. So long as even a minority in that community refuses to acknowledge you as 'belonging' to it, you remain an alien presence and are certain to be treated as such at various times.

In any event, most of us are bound to think there is something distinctly unwholesome about anybody seemingly anxious to disown their own racial and cultural heritage in order to acquire a spurious identity elsewhere. Flattering as it is to the chosen host community when so many seem anxious to join, it does not alter the basic incongruity of the situation. Better a happy duck any day than an imitation swan.

GUESTS

Invited strangers can never be more than guests in your home; and when they are not invited you will quite properly feel yourself to have been invaded, whatever their own ideas about 'belongingness'.

The fact that uninvited immigrants much prefer living here is quite understandable; but that doesn't make them genuine citizens any more than squatters can be called residents.

Britain is the homeland of a people with Anglo-Saxon-Celtic ancestry going back many centuries. The country belongs to us as we do to it. People of altogether different ancestry and culture cannot therefore belong here since, unlike the natives, they manifestly belong somewhere else. Any property, any job, any school or college place, any hospital bed and any other item belonging to Britain can only be taken by these aliens as a form of misappropriation, since such taking is necessarily at the expense of the native population. And contending that the aliens make a valuable contribution to the country's economy and welfare does not alter that underlying reality one iota. It is historically self-evident that this country is not only perfectly capable of looking after itself; it is also a fact that it looked after most of the immigrants' world for two or three centuries. Moreover, the economic input of recent immigrants, most of them uneducated and unskilled, is vastly exceeded by what they take out in terms of this country's socio-economic and cultural assets and the damage their presence does to its social cohesion and morale. You will be hard put to it to find Afro-Caribbeans making any significant contribution to this country's intellectual or cultural capital. And Asians, very prominent in retail, commerce and catering, are conspicuously absent from the building, civil and mechanical engineering scenes. Businessmen they certainly are; but their contribution to the nation's basic economic infra-structure is negligible, and their cultural impact imperceptible outside the curry parlour (pace Robin Cook and chicken tikka masala). The vast majority of the people of this country are perfectly happy with their own culture and feel under no obligation whatsoever to have it mongrelised to make unwanted immigrants feel more at home.

Bluntly speaking, it ought to be plain enough to everybody that while Third World immigrants obviously want Britain to belong to them, they can never belong to it. And all talk of 'integration' of the unwanted immigrants ignores the perfectly legitimate resistance of the native population to such enforced social engineering; people, after all, are less keen on integration than crocodiles.

MINIMAL CONCESSIONS TO HOST COUNTRY

In any event, the clear intention of many of the intruders is to make minimal concessions to the host country while doing everything they can to re-shape it to their own ends. Some Muslims, for example, will always regard the Sharia (Islamic law) as taking precedence over secular legislation here and elsewhere (why else the so-called 'Muslim Parliament?'), and they won't rest until we are all hearing the muezzin's call to prayer instead of church bells. Cultures just don't mix; either they assert their values and expand their territory or they are quickly displaced by others. So much is patently obvious from history, and all the news reports of inter-racial and inter-religious conflicts around the world.

The blind bigotry of our liberal politicians in their obsessive promotion of the 'multi-racial society' is therefore every bit as menacing to peace and stability as Muslim fanaticism. Both lay claim to the moral high ground and insist that the end justifies whatever means they choose to adopt. History is littered with high-minded atrocities; indeed, most of the postcolonial massacres in Africa and Asia can be laid squarely at the door of those who so piously campaigned to unleash the perpetrators from European constraints. But the so-called 'law of unforeseen consequences' still shadows the liberal manifesto.

'Racism' is merely the label used by renegade politicians to stifle any opposition to their perverse ideology; so those resisting alien attempts to misappropriate our country and heritage must expect to be persecuted, and even sometimes prosecuted, by these latter-day witch-hunters, armed with their 'human rights catalogue', search warrants and anti-British legislation. Needless to say 'racists', in their book, have no rights at all!

Even so, and like our most illustrious ancestors, we know where we belong and will do whatever it takes to ensure that our country never belongs to anyone else. And in so doing – to borrow a somewhat tattered piece of liberal dogma – we are simply asserting the right of self-determination. We are just determined to safeguard our homeland against misappropriation by aliens. Make no mistake about it, 'belongingness' is the very heart and soul of patriotism and admits of no ideological dilution. It's what wars are really about. So if disaffected immigrants really want to feel a sense of belonging, all they have to do is return to their homelands. One thing is certain: they will never find it here.

Sir,

I am writing to express my disgust at the continual sniping at the current leadership (and policies) of the BNP through the pages of Spearhead.

In the December 2001 issue a correspondent chose to vent his spleen about such matters before invoking the 'Name-and-address-supplied' cloak of anonymity.

Such bravery.

If that writer objects so much to policies of the party then he should have the courage of his convictions and leave it.

It is only natural for a radical political party to have its detractors, but the last thing our movement needs at present is the unnecessary airing of dissenting views from within its own ranks. When one gives one's support to any political party it is on the basis of agreeing to the majority of a raft of policy objectives. If one is to fully (and genuinely) embrace the principles of 'democracy' then one is obliged to occasionally swallow the bitter pill of compromise.

The history of nationalist politics in Britain over the past fifty years is littered with bright new dawns that were scuppered by factional infighting. Now is the time to put all of this behind us once and for all. If one is unable or unwilling to take on board the new status quo, then he or she should go and go now.

The BNP under the leadership of Nick Griffin, although far from being the finished article, is at least trying to address the concerns of the masses in a populist manner that these folk can relate to. Many policies may have been modified (or watered down, depending on one's standpoint), but in order to achieve tangible electoral success it has proven necessary to be more pragmatic. By tangible success I don't mean saved deposits or winning an isolated council seat in a deprived area. I mean the taking of seats in council chambers up and down the country, year in year out, hopefully followed by the natural progression of returning BNP Members of Parliament. The long-ignored indigenous working classes of Britain have found a new champion of their cause and we mustn't betray them in their hour of need.

In this cause therefore a respected publication such as Spearhead must not allow itself to be dragged into the mire of unadulterated vindictiveness. It is perfectly acceptable, and indeed understandable, that the Editor should express his personal opinions within its pages but less than subtle attacks on current BNP officials are just not on. Whatever disagreements may exist between the Editor and Mr. Lecomber, et al, are best dealt with out of the public domain. Who could possibly gain from such bickering? Only our enemies of course.

The entire Tyndall/Griffin/Lecomber saga of claim and counter-claim must be bought to an end. As a normal party member I am growing increasingly irritated by this ultimately self-destructive behaviour. Continuation of this bitter wrangling is a betrayal of those activists who are out on the doorsteps of Britain every evening, come rain or shine, trying to get the nationalist message across.

The era for navel-gazing has now gone forever. Let it rest in peace. Permanently.

The time has now come for the Editor to finally, and gracefully, accept that the British National Party has moved on since its formation in the early 1980s. Its founding father should be thanked and applauded for putting serious electoral politics back onto the nationalist political agenda, but that was then and this is now. Times change and people, for better or worse, change with those times. And so must the policies.

EDITOR'S NOTE: We are printing this letter in a section of its own on this page, separate from our letters page, because it exceeds the normal length of letters printed on that page. Letters like this place us in a dilemma. If we decline to print them we are laying ourselves open to charges of silencing dissent. If we print them with comments of the kind this one obviously invites, we will be accused of prolonging the very thing that the writer says he opposes. We are therefore printing the letter with no comment – save to say that apparently Mr. Ladd believes that in the kind of democratic party to which he refers fundamental policy changes should be made with no consultation with the membership and with no subsequent criticism allowed. Beyond saying this, we grant him the last word.

September 11th outrages: questions unanswered

MICHAEL WALSH asks: were the buildings demolished from the inside, and were the Israelis forewarned?

WITH passions subsiding and public enthusiasm for the colonisation of Arab-Asia waning, watch out for further American-Israeli-inspired outrages callously designed to revive sympathy and support for their Third World War.

There is growing evidence that there was more than a dirty arm up Israel's tunic sleeve in respect of the cataclysmic destruction of the World Trade Centres on September 11th last year. Israel openly admits it is a major beneficiary of the New York tragedy. Behind the smoke of the collapsing towers, the Israelis upped their territorial demands on the beleaguered and tormented Palestinians and diverted world attention away from their own atrocities.

The public's gut response, outrage and thirst for vengeance is being rapidly evaporated by emerging evidence that questions hysteria made 'on the hoof'. One doesn't need a long memory to recall that the Oklahoma bombing, for which Timothy McVeigh was executed, was initially placed at Bin Laden's cave entrance!

ISRAELI JUBILATION

In the cold light of day it has emerged that American security officials arrested a number of Israeli subjects for jubilantly filming the attack whilst it actually took place. The filming was directed from a Jewish-owned New York building offering an unequalled platform to film the horrendous unfolding events. The officials also want to know why over 4,000 Israelis who might normally be found behind their desks at the WTC coincidentally took a 'sickie' on that fateful day.

The respected Jordanian newspaper al-Watan surmised the hand of the Israeli security organisation Shabak, which likewise cancelled Israeli premier Ariel Sharon's scheduled attendance at a New York Jewish shindig on the evening before the calamity.

As evidence emerges that Israel had foreknowledge of the attack, certain sections of the US intelligence apparatus want to know why they were kept in the dark.

STRANGELY FEW JEWISH VICTIMS

Suspicion was further heightened when the international Reuters news agency published a list of the casualties of the attack, including those still missing. Though 26 nations lost citizens, not a single victim was listed as being of Israeli extraction. This in New York City, which boasts a Jewish population greater than that of the state of Israel itself!

The Jewish Chronicle of September 14th conceded: "Though no Israeli firms had offices in the twin towers, Zim Navigation only last week moved its headquarters, with 100 employees, from the Trade Centre to Virginia."

TRADE CENTRES DEMOLISHED

Equally alarming is the extent of the destruction, which far surpasses that which experts might expect from a couple of airliner kamikaze attacks. Both buildings were actually designed to withstand the impact of a jumbo jet.

The building designers, architects and construction experts are far from stupid, and are not prone to make exaggerated claims. Insurers too are meticulous if nothing else when assessing risk. This cannot be written off as another 'unsinkable Titanic' boast.

The buildings, in fact, lived up to expectations, absorbing and surviving both hits. After each strike, the floors directly effected were destroyed and the collateral damage moved upwards, but the twin colossi remained otherwise impervious. There was no good reason why they shouldn't have survived. A reinforced concrete building, especially of this magnitude, is virtually indestructible.

A PERFECT SYMMETRICAL COLLAPSE - TWICE!

Thirty minutes after impact, the fires in both skyscrapers went out; there was smoke but there were no flames. It was over an hour later when mysteriously (by all previous experience) each building conveniently collapsed rather than toppled, as might be expected. Each skyscraper folded at a uniform synchronised rate just as might be expected - but only if each of the many supports in each building had simultaneously collapsed. Experts have already likened both events as a 'demolition'. There is growing suspicion that this hits the precise red button.

The initial story fed to the unquestioningly compliant media was that the disintegration of the towers could be explained by burning jet fuel causing beams supporting the buildings to melt (at 800°C). But much, if not all, of each aircraft's fuel complement was immediately consumed in the fireballs, which erupted on impact. Such that remained would have been exhausted long before the passing of over an hour and each building's subsequent failure.

Furthermore, it

The Manhattan skyline after the attacks: was it only the hi-jacked planes that caused the damage?

can be assumed that the extensive sprinkler system would have automatically been released, dampening, if not extinguishing, the inferno from the moment of impact. Thus the claim that thousands of gallons of burning jet fuel produced a (much delayed) raging inferno leading to the collapse of the formidable steel and concrete structures is dubious, to say the least. The evidence suggests otherwise.

EXPERT SUGGESTS A DEMOLITION JOB

Mr. Van Romero, vice-president for research at New Mexico (USA) Institute of Mining and Technology stated: "The collapse of the twin towers resembled those of controlled implosions used in planned demolitions." He added: "My opinion, based on the video tapes, is that after the aeroplanes hit the World Trade Centre some explosive devices inside the buildings caused the towers to collapse."

"The detonations could have been caused by a small amount of explosives put in more than one place in each of the towers. It could have been a relatively small amount of explosives placed at each point," the distinguished expert added.

Demolition experts agree the WTC was demolished. One said: "To demolish a building, you don't need all that explosive but it needs to be placed in a number of strategic locations and ignited in a smooth, timed sequence. Someone had to have a lot of access and a lot of time in the towers to do this."

It is highly unlikely that a score of swarthy-looking Arabs, sneaking unchallenged past hundreds of highly trained security guards, entered the bowels of the buildings where public access is denied – each of these having an expertise in demolition, including remote control technology that goes far beyond the usual and often amateurish Arab-Israeli conflict truck bomb.

SPIN-DOCTORS ON THE RETREAT

As the truth emerges and the suppression of informed opinion becomes more difficult, the spin-doctors are becoming more agitated. Massive demonstrations against the rush to war are being air-brushed out of news bulletins.

The Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament's Whitehall rally attracted over 10,000 dissidents. These events were widely covered throughout the world, but our own BBC (Blair's Bunch of Cronies) censored coverage, despite it being the biggest such demonstration in London for decades. Similar protests were held in Manchester and Glasgow. Reports of these too were censored.

What was released repeatedly, however, was the strident call from a military commander demanding that people "support their boys," and implying that failure to do so was tantamount to treachery and lack of patriotic backbone.

As this is unlikely to shore up flagging morale in Britain, we can expect yet another outrage to re-focus public

A BIT LATE THIS MONTH

This month's issue of Spearhead is a little later than usual. Our printers and print-finishers (though not ourselves) closed down over the whole of the Christmas and New Year period, and the printing of the issue could not begin until the 2nd January. Publication will be back to normal as from February.

MADHOUSE BRITAIN

ROY WHITING, the paedophile who was given life imprisonment for sexually assaulting and murdering little Sarah Payne, was previously convicted of kidnapping and raping another nine-year-old girl in 1995 and was given a mere four-year sentence, of which he served just over two years.

When recently questioned, Judge John Gower, the man on the bench in that case, said he had "no regrets" and that, to him, criticism of the sentence was "water off a duck's back."

THE WINNING entry in the 2001 Turner Prize competition was an empty room with the lights going on and off. The winning 'artist' was 33-year-old Martin Creed.

In a report on the Guardian website it was stated that the judges, who included Tate Gallery supremo Sir Nicholas Serota, loved the work "for its daring and for driving some traditionalists to apoplexy."

A DISABLED couple in Carlisle, John and Margaret Wright, have been plagued by vandals, burglars and young thugs, who among other things poisoned their two dogs, so they installed security cameras, both as a deterrent and to gather evidence.

But when they presented the police with film of an attack in their garden they were warned that they must take the cameras down as they invaded the privacy of their attackers. The penalty for failure to comply with this order is a fine of £5,000. The two have now been forced out of their home.

A SOLDIER from Lanarkshire who suffered cold feet six years ago while standing in a trench of icy water was awarded £75,000 damages from the Army. It has not been stated whether the survivors from World War I who suffered the same fate will receive the same hand-outs.

BRITAIN'S public services were issued in December with a 255-page 'race equality' code containing target rules for the hiring of ethnic minority members by public bodies, including health authorities, schools and colleges, police and local councils. These bodies number a total of 40,000 and include such organisations as the Apple and Pear Research Council and the Scottish Deer Commission.

In a Daily Mail report (4th December) it was stated that: "All public authorities are to be compelled to follow a long, detailed and legally binding code of practice that puts race at the top of their priorities. Schools are told to direct money and teaching effort to cut expulsions and improve results among pupils from minority backgrounds."

The new code was introduced by lesbian government minister Angela Eagle.

CROWN Prosecution Service Director David Calvert-Smith has agreed with the authors of two separate reports that the CPS is 'institutionally racist'. Staff in the CPS's Croydon office had voluntarily segregated themselves along racial lines. Managers were aware of this but had done nothing about it.

Multi-racial Britain a breeding ground for terror

THE NATION was horrified last month to hear of the story of Richard Reid, an Islamic militant who very nearly blew up an airliner by means of a bomb fitted into his shoe. Reid was tackled and overpowered by passengers on the plane after he had been seen acting suspiciously, trying to apply a light to the shoe. Both his shoes were found, when examined afterwards, to contain a complex mixture of explosives which almost certainly would have destroyed the aircraft had they gone off.

In our legions of ethnic minorities, says JAMES THURGOOD, the likes of bin Laden can find an almost unlimited recruitment pool

And who is Richard Reid? A Saudi? An Iraqi? An Afghan? Well, not exactly. Reid was born in Bromley, Kent. His mother is British and his father believed to be of Jamaican origin. He has a criminal record as long as your arm, and was actually recruited to the cause of Islam when in Feltham Young Offenders' Institute in Middlesex, then won over to its militant wing later in a mosque in Brixton. People like him abound in Britain's penal institutions. A front-page report in The Sunday Telegraph on December 30th revealed that the Government had ignored warnings issued more than a year previously that Islamic militants were infiltrating prisons and recruiting inmates, of which there were ample number who were fair game in that regard. This apparently was done by Muslims getting into the prisons posing as religious advisers, whereby they had easy access to prisoners sharing their own faith – just as prison chaplains could speak to Christians inside. One senior Muslim cleric was quoted as saying of the warnings given to the Government: "Sadly, nothing was done."

Thousands in the wings

But this is just the tip of a dangerous iceberg. There are thousands of would-be terrorists where Reid is coming from. While the Government is sounding national and worldwide alarms against terrorism, its policies and those of its predecessors have made Britain a country that is among the worst equipped anywhere to deal with the terrorist threat.

In an article in The Daily Telegraph just two days previous, on December 28, Daniel Johnson addressed the wider problem. Heading his piece 'Bin Laden is winning the battle in Britain', he said:-

"Abdul Hacqu Baker, the chairman of the Brixton mosque where Reid is alleged to have been recruited by Muslim extremists, estimates that there are at least 1,000 other young fundamentalists like Reid in Britain; at least 100 may be potential suicide bombers. He told Radio Four listeners that he and others in Brixton had warned the police repeatedly over the past four or five years of the danger, but had merely been told that these groups were being 'monitored'. Mr. Baker added that the town hall had been used for extremist meetings and that the local authority, though aware of the problem. Felt that it had to be fair to all sides. Lambeth Council has some explaining to do."

Reference to the Council's policy of 'fairness' cannot fail to raise a laugh. Can you really imagine that same Council agreeing to hire meeting halls to the British National Party in accordance with the same principles? But we are digressing. Let writer Johnson continue relating the experience of those who tried warning the powers that be concerning the recruitment of the militants:-

"The Met's spokesman was anything but reassuring. Apparently the police and security services had been too busy 'sifting through' reports actually to investigate, let alone clamp down on, al-Qa'eda recruitment in such places as Brixton. He glossed over the risks to the public and quickly moved on to the safer ground of combating 'Islamophobia' and the British National Party. One shudders to think of the terrorist schemes that may even now be in train, and which might so easily have been nipped in the bud if the authorities had acted promptly. To use intelligence properly requires well, intelligence. We ought not to have required September 11th to teach us that."

And even more to the point:-

"The suffocating atmosphere of multi-cultural political correctness has, at least until very recently, paralysed the police and the legal system. Now it may be too late." (JT's emphasis)

The picture we have here is very clear. There is now a huge non-white population pool in Britain from which Islamic militants can be recruited. And these do not just comprise people of Arab or Asian origin; Reid was part white, part West Indian. Many Afro-Caribbeans or mixtures of the same are ripe for conversion to Islam – we have heard, of course, of the Black Muslims. As the multi-racial society breaks down, as nationalists have always warned that it would, this population – particularly its younger elements – is becoming increasingly alienated, as events in the North of England last Summer made clear. Into the breach step the recruiting officers for terrorism – with ample prospects lined up and available.

Authorities paralysed

But when it comes to action by the authorities to combat the danger, there is paralysis. The politically correct culture that dominates the police hierarchy rules that ethnic minority groups must not be offended. Every officer contemplating firm action where this might involve treading on the toes of the minorities (whether these be defined by race or religion) knows that he is likely to have to answer to some interfering commissar of the race relations industry who can, and very likely will, block his future promotion.

In the days when this was an overwhelmingly white country with non-Europeans, where they were present, sticking out like sore thumbs, there would have been none of these problems. No such recruitment pool would have existed. And as for keeping surveillance on possible Islamic terrorists, this would have been a simple matter with the very tiny number of 'ethnics' in our midst. A man or woman of Middle-Eastern, Asian or Negro appearance seen in the vicinity of an airport or any other important public place would immediately have become an object of suspicion, and treated accordingly. Now there are hundreds of thousands of such people, and amongst them the terrorist is like a needle in a haystack.

The solution? We should not, as some would advocate, regard all Muslims as a threat – just because they are Muslims. This is a racial issue and we should tackle it at a racial level. Remove the ethnic minorities, whether Muslim or otherwise, from Britain and the terrorist problem is 90 per cent solved.

How to be a good citizen

The Euro-tweets in Brussels are dreaming up new legislation which will outlaw holocaust denial, racism and this column's favourite party game, xenophobia. Taking this to its logical conclusion, it would seem that, when the finishing touches are put to the monstrous European super-state, it will be quite legitimate to come out with something like: "I really detest the EU and all it stands for. As for being a European, I hate that too, and would prefer to be Chinese if given the chance." Now what could be less xenophobic than that?

Courtroom drama

Staying, if you can stand it, in Brussels for the moment, we reported here in August that some intrepid Palestinians were prosecuting Mr. Ariel Sharon, the Israeli Prime Minister, for war crimes and acts of genocide. Now we read that Mr. Sharon's legal team have told the Belgian appeals court that if the case goes ahead it could violate international law and set back relations between Israel and Belgium. We confer on these people the annual Junius award for unbridled arrogance.

Home from home – for some!

In recent correspondence we learned that, in a North East prison, inmates can receive only those magazines and newspapers which have been stamped by a newsagent. Thus Spearhead and Freedom are denied to those inside. Was this, we wondered, a Home Office ruling? Indeed it was. And did it apply across the board? Indeed it did not! Pursuing our inquiries, we spoke to a lady working in what she described as a 'relaxed' prison in Kent, who told us that chums or relatives could send in, or bring in, whatever they wanted to. No problem.

Now, while we cannot apply any rule of thumb here, it appears to work rather like this: If you are some desperado who has nicked a ballpoint pen from W.H. Smith, you may well end up in a top-security institution where there are few privileges. On the other hand, if you are an establishment figure, like Jeffrey Archer, who has had the rotten luck to get sent down for perverting the course of justice, or maybe a financial genius whose demanding life style has forced you into purloining a few millions of somebody else's money, then it's the holiday camp atmosphere for you!

Some observations on contemporary society

While we have no wish to get involved in the minutiae of Party policy, we rather hope that, under a nationalist government, a prison sentence will mean just that, without reference to who or what you are.

No go for Ngo

Although, in general, ambition is to be applauded, it should, we believe, ever be tempered with compassion. Unfortunately Phuong Ngo, deputy mayor of Cabramatta in South Western Sydney, was not the compassionate sort. He coveted Mr. John Newman's seat in the New South Wales state parliament and, to set things rolling, as it were, he hired an assassin to visit Mr. Newman's home and put two fatal bullets in his chest. He was sent down for life. We think he should have been put down for good.

Ticket to paradise?

We seem to spend an inordinate amount of time in the supermarket making sure, as far as is humanly possible, that only British produce ends up in the trolley. Obviously things like wine and corned beef present a problem, but at least nothing from Argentina gets past the eagle eye of your columnist.

Which reminds us of the heartrending story of Jane, who went shopping for a hubby in The Gambia, as we reported in Spearhead No. 389. And now we have the truly tear-jerking and poignant tale of Sarah, who married the love of her life, Huseyin a Turkish barman, her parents picking up the £1,500 bill for the local festivities involved. After the wedding bells – or whatever they have in Turkey – Sarah and family forked out another £1,000 to help Huseyin get a visa but, sorry to say, the cash somehow got spent elsewhere. However, he did finally arrive in Kettering, where dad-in-law had found him a job, but then pushed off and was not seen or heard of for a couple of weeks, until the unlucky bride got a 'phone call informing her that he was shackled up in the North-East with a pregnant girl friend. He, would you believe it, is now filing for divorce, while she is trying to get him deported. We will never claim that Anglo-Saxon-Celtic man is perfect but, you should face it ladies, home-grown is best!

What is an Afghan?

Speaking of tribes, it is salutary to remember that before September 11th Afghanistan was scarcely an everyday topic at the 'local'. Now all has changed, and interesting facts have emerged. What most folk thought to be a nation is in fact a conglomeration of several different, independent peoples who at best live in mutual suspicion of each other, and seem to have no compunction about cutting a throat or two when the mood takes them. The Pentagon's ally, the Northern Alliance, itself comprises 14 separate tribes – uneasily, and scarcely permanently, united in the cause to defeat the Taliban. Oddly, these fierce assertions of racial identity seem to have been taken for granted by the media and the politically correct establishment as a whole. It seems that maniacal tribalism is OK in Afghanistan but, when Western Europe is invaded and occupied by millions of all the races under then sun, the natives are threatened with punishment if they so much as make a murmur in protest. Yet surely they also have rights, including that most vital right to live, and enjoy that life, in the company of their own kind.

Both sides of the coin

"Race-hate yobs sink to new low," screeched the Tyneside Evening Chronicle when reporting on the peaceful BNP leafletting of the Bensham district of Gateshead. "The police," we were told, "have launched a hunt for the racists." At around the same time, several miles to the South in Bradford, Brown Owl Lucy-Jane Marshall, aged 22, was being pelted with stones and called a "Christian bitch." As the victim herself said, "If that isn't racist, what is?" As for the brownies, who have met in the parish church for over 20 years, they have had to choose a safer meeting place. No doubt all will be comforted by the comments of a West Yorkshire police spokesman who "deplored" the incident, which is "being looked into."

A sporting chronicle

Sport England (what a ghastly name!) is, if you have not already guessed, a quango, and one which has been roundly condemned by MPs for its pathetic handling of the Wembley Stadium affair and other little cock-ups. And yet, when chief executive Derek Casey decided, voluntarily, that maybe it was time to quit, Richard Caborn MP, the Minister for Culture, Media and Sport (where do they find these names?), fixed him up with a pay-off off worth £494,000. Ministerial colleagues, perhaps reflecting on their self-righteous indignation whenever private industry rewards failure, were none too pleased. The Opposition thought it might be hush money. Well they should know!

Lament at Westminster

"Well, you know how it is. Journalists are always snooping about, and we do have this noble tradition of one party spilling the beans on the other. The public begins to get a bit uptight about it all; thinks that we're all crooks. So we hire this Filkin woman. I mean, she's not supposed to actually do anything, but just be around in case of something or other. Then guess what happens. She wants to see private papers and starts to ask all sorts of awkward questions. Gives poor old Keith Vaz a hell of a time, and that when he's not feeling too good. Said she came from the Inland Revenue. Got ourselves a rottweiler when we only needed a poodle. I mean, who can feel safe in an atmosphere like that?"

SIR: I was horrified to receive a recent BNP membership bulletin which shows (if it is not intentional) an incredible political naivety. The party is now effectively supporting Sharon of Israel, Blair and Bush in their campaign to destroy Islam, which, worldwide, is the last bastion against Zionist world government.

I yield to no-one in my strength of feeling that all non-white immigrants to the UK, including Muslims, have no place here; but the fact remains that Islam is now the only fighting force to oppose Zionism and its evil influence in the world. Of course, Islam is not doing it for us, but that does not diminish its broad value to our cause.

I served in Palestine, Egypt and Trans-jordan. Furthermore, I have recently been in Yemen, so I have some knowledge of Islam. Real Muslims wish to secure their own countries, not to take over ours. They are under pressure not only in Afghanistan but in Chechnya, Indonesia and many other places, including Palestine, where they have suffered atrocities for over 50 years. The BNP, if it is still genuine, needs to consider the Roman proverb: "My enemy's enemy is my friend." Until it realises the truth of this, it will get no more support from me.

D.J. WILLIAMS
Oxted, Surrey

SIR: On page 8 of the November issue, Ian Buckley uses the infamous quote from an alleged speech by Rabbi Rabinovich. This quote is a well-known fake; it was forged by Eustace Mullins, along with the Israel Cohen 'Racial programme for the 20th century' quote, which was exposed by the Washington Evening Star in 1958 and again by A.K. Chesterton, who published an article attacking Mullins in Candour in September 1970.

In 1998 I drew this to the attention of the late Rosine de Bounevalle, who incredibly had endorsed both spurious quotes in the August 1997 issue of Candour. Previously, in 1994, I published a detailed history of both these quotes called 'Not the Protocols of Zion'. I would respectfully suggest that Spearhead publishes a retraction. Endorsing this sort of trash, unwittingly or otherwise, only gives spurious credence to the likes of the Searchlight organisation in its ongoing efforts to denigrate white (Gentile) nationalists.

A. BARON
London S.E.26

(EDITOR'S NOTE: It is not possible for us to check the authenticity of every quote or claim made by our contributors. However, if the quote used by Ian Buckley in the article referred to was not authentic we regret it, and we thank Mr. Baron for drawing this fact to our attention.)

SIR: Ligaments bind muscle to bone, enabling the body to function. In rather the same way, religion (from ligare: to bind) is that which connects all other aspects of truth, so that the whole outlook in some way 'makes sense', and is not artificially concocted for a purpose.

Pastor John's 'New Christian Crusade' (Spearhead, November) has all the marks of just that. In spite of his astute 'View of unfolding events', it is hard to see how anyone could believe the conclusions he draws from biblical quotations. As an attempt to rationalise racialism, it is too obvious to be anything other than counter-productive.

Most European nationalists have been Christian, and most probably still are. In our pluralistic societies we are increasingly used to working inter-denominationally. No-one wants any 'sectarian bias', still less to be ruled by clergymen (even Pastor Johns).

But organised inhumanity justified by racial fanaticism is something the electorate fears, and this is what holds up progress. Christians of any sort hold one thing in common: in spite of failures, they cannot feel justified in treating their fellow men as anything less than human.

So a respectful 'nodding acquaintance', at the very least, with mainstream Christianity, open recognition that it lies at the root of our culture, might save the BNP from being burdened as it already is with the narrowest sectarian bias.

JOAN WHITE (Miss)
Canterbury, Kent

SIR: Thank you for allowing both sides of the repatriation debate to be aired in your columns.

I think the notion that there are large numbers of Africans and Asians just waiting for someone to pay their fares home is completely false. I cannot imagine that any of them would willingly swap their nice British dwellings, with all 'mod-cons', access to welfare benefits and the NHS, for a Third World hovel and a life of back-breaking toil for starvation wages and the potions of the witch doctor.

What is needed is a new British Nationality Act confirming citizenship to those of us who are native Britons and restricting naturalisation to persons of pure European descent, good health and good character who can be assimilated without causing any perceptible change in the composition of Britain's population. All others would then become aliens with no right to permanent residence or access to welfare benefits.

L.J. IRVING

SIR: In his article 'Fighting for an all-white Britain' (December issue) John Tyndall speaks of zero ethnic minorities as a desired policy for the BNP. Does he literally advocate this?

A.D. PERKINS
Worcester

(JOHN TYNDALL REPLIES: In an article already rather long, I was trying to save space by avoidance of superfluous references and qualifications. The phrase 'ethnic minorities' was, in this context, used to mean minorities of non-white origin and therefore unassimilable. It did not include such people as those of Dutch, Polish, Latvian or other European backgrounds. Also, of course, a policy of zero ethnic minorities could not, in practice, exclude certain non-Europeans who would require to reside here as diplomats, embassy staff, trade representatives for their countries, and so on. However, permission for such residence would have to include clauses prohibiting marriage to, or other sexual relations with, Britons or other Europeans.)

SIR: The Chancellor, with uncharacteristic but refreshing change of attitude, has for once openly admitted that he will help himself to more of our hard-earned wages, instead of employing his usual method of picking our pockets secretly with stealth taxes.

More money, he says, is needed for the NHS. Well, more and more money will always be needed for the NHS. It is an unwieldy monster that grows bigger in direct proportion to the money put into it.

However, in this latest charade by Tone and his gang the NHS is merely a stalking horse. The fact of the matter is that, like all socialist governments that have ever been, this one is running out of other people's money.

More revenue is needed to plug the gaping hole in the fiscal budget because the foot-and-mouth fiasco, compounded by the ignorance, incompetence and panic of Tone and his gang, has deprived the Treasury of vast sums of money – far more than anyone will dare to admit. Also the asylum-seeker industry is costing the Treasury (i.e. the taxpayer) huge sums – again far more than anyone will admit. No tourists with money to spend; only immigrants looking for handouts – plus the lawyers and support organisations and landlords who make fortunes from it all. All money from the taxpayers, of course.

There are too many fleas on the dog's back. Those who produce nothing are proliferating and will soon outnumber those who produce everything. So the dog is constrained to support ever more fleas. That's why Gordon wants more of our money.

N.G. CHARNLEY
Blackpool, Lancs.

SIR: We are engaged in a war in a far-off country costing the taxpayer millions while we face riots on the streets at home. Why should we be sending some of our finest troops all over the world while our own country is in such a terrible state?

R. BALLARD
Southampton, Hants.

Please note this fact, which is of great importance: the books sold through Freedom Books are written by many different authors holding a number of different political and/or religious viewpoints, very few of them being in any way connected with Freedom Books' parent organisation, the British National Party. The party's mail order book service distributes these books because it is felt that they fill important gaps in public information and understanding of vital national and international issues. This does not mean that all the content of the books should be taken as representative of the policies of the party. VERY GOOD BURNLEY RESULTS

BRITISH NATIONAL PARTY candidates achieved most encouraging results in three local government by-elections in Burnley (Lancs.) over November and December.

We reported two of these results in a stop press piece last month but made a mistake over one of them. This was where we referred to the vote won by Mark Terrell in Trinity Ward as coming to 10 per cent of the poll. In fact, Mr. Terrell's vote (181 in aggregate) amounted to 19 per cent. We were aware of the correct figure but committed a typographical error when putting it into print. This was not picked up by our proof-reader because he did not know the result. Our editor takes the full blame and extends apologies to Mr. Terrell.

As correctly stated in our November report, Carol Ann Hughes, standing in Lower House Ward, won 283 votes (23.5 per cent).

Both these by-elections took place on November 22nd – just before the vicious BBC Panorama programme on the party broadcast on November 25th. Many waited with interest to see whether the third by-election, due on the 29th November and after the broadcast, would yield a poorer result for the BNP in consequence. In fact, James Cowell, standing in Rosehill Ward, obtained 230 votes, which came to 19.2 per cent of the poll – similar to the other results the week before. Reports from the local BNP do not indicate any big differences in the composition of the populations of the respective wards, so it can be said confidently that the voters were not in any significant way influenced by the rabid anti-BNP slant of the programme. We also hear that Labour had as many as 40 canvassers out during the Rosehill ward campaign. They must be sick at the BNP result!

THE CANDIDATES

The Eleventh Hour

The Eleventh Hour has been described as the 'Bible' of the British National Party. First published in 1988, the latest (1998) edition has been updated to take in the many new developments on the political scene occurring since. Written by the founder of the British National Party, John Tyndall, the book gives comprehensive coverage of all the major current issues affecting Britain. It delves into the ideologies of liberalism, conservatism and the left, and also examines that of British Nationalism and its background. It contains extensive analyses of the British economy and political system. It looks at issues connected with freedom and order, the mass media, the environment, race and immigration, Northern Ireland, the Commonwealth, foreign policy and defence. It also gives a detailed outline of the development of the BNP and its predecessor organisations in Britain.

The Eleventh Hour runs to 537 pages. It is partly autobiographical, giving an account of the author's origins, early political awakening and subsequent life's work.

Price: Hardback £25.00 plus £4.30 p&p; softback £17.50 plus £3.32 p&p. Please make out cheques to Albion Press and send to PO Box 2471, Hove, E. Sussex BN3 4DT.

TWO SUGGESTIONS FOR 2002

Spearhead has two suggestions for the new year which are put to the British National Party leadership in a constructive spirit and which we hope will be taken up.

One is that the party revive the Annual Rally, which in past years was a great morale-booster and fund-raiser, but which has not been held since 1998. Last year there were a southern rally and a northern rally but no nationwide rally for the whole UK. There is nothing wrong with continuing with the southern and northern rallies but a national rally should be held in addition to, not in place of, these events.

The other suggestion is that the party revert to its former policy of publishing in its newspaper lists of all party units across the country so that the British public – and prospective members especially – are able to see that the BNP is organised over almost the whole of the UK, and also so that such would-be joiners will be all the more encouraged to get involved with the party by seeing that there are active units in or close to their areas.

We were never able to understand why these practices – an annual national rally and the regular publication of unit lists – were discontinued. It is

Anti-Islam demo in London

On the 17th November British National Party activists held an anti-Islam demonstration in London's Parliament Square. Above is a section of the BNP team. Below two activists dressed up as Crusaders are pictured putting to the sword an effigy of Prime Minister Blair.

The meetings that never took place

Readers who thought they were present at three meetings addressed by our Editor in Oldham, Sutton-in-Ashfield (Notts.) and Dewsbury over September and November will be surprised to learn that the meetings in fact never took place!

This, at least, is what might be gleaned from readings of the official BNP publications, The Voice of Freedom and Identity. We ensured to get reports of the meetings to these publications well in time for them to be printed, but none of them appeared! They were neatly air-brushed out of party news. According to the party, they just didn't happen.

By contrast, Spearhead always prints reports of BNP meetings that it receives. There are meetings of which we never receive reports but this is not our fault. We did receive a report of a meeting that BNP chairman Nick Griffin addressed in Sunderland last July, and this was faithfully printed in our August issue. So it will continue to be as long as the reports are sent to us.

We mention these matters not in anger but in sadness, mingled with just a little amusement. It illustrates jealous, frightened little people obsessed with factional quarrels rather than with our common nationalist cause.

Our Editor and Mrs. Tyndall would like to express their thanks for the many greetings cards they received from readers and supporters over the Christmas period. They trust that everyone will understand that reciprocal cards could not be sent in all cases, and hope that senders will accept in lieu these greetings for the season and for a happy new year.

SPEARHEAD SUPPORT FUND

Income from the sales of our magazine is not enough to cover full production and administrative costs. We therefore rely on regular donations from our supporters so that we may remain solvent.

Also, because of the controversial nature of the opinions expressed in these columns, it is impossible to induce wholesale distributors to handle the magazine. Hence our need for additional financial support.

Please send all contributions to Spearhead, PO Box 2471, Hove, East Sussex BN3 4DT. Please note that receipts are not normally sent for donations of less than £10 unless specifically requested – in which case an SAE would be much appreciated. Thanks.

HEALTHIER TIMES

The picture above shows British schoolchildren celebrating Empire Day in 1933. Quite a difference from the schools of today!

The youngsters here are being imbued with national pride and taught to respect their country's history and heritage.

They are being encouraged to stand up straight and salute the flag.

And, it will be noticed, they are all white!

In the schools of 2002, pupils are kept in ignorance of their history and heritage. If the British Empire is mentioned in classes, it is to denigrate it and portray it as evil and an 'exploiter' of its subject races. Our national flag is depicted as a 'racist' symbol and scarcely ever displayed.

And a very large number of the pupils are black or Asian, with no attachment to our heritage. Political correctness rules.

We in the British National Party believe things should be done differently.

We want to see a return to the days when our young people were taught patriotism, made to respect our flag and encouraged to honour our achievements and our traditions.

And something else: we want a country that is again white – and British!
